"I'm sorry to hear that. It's the same old story. I suppose they'd all like to live in the city and wear low necked gowns and high heeled shoes. No, I can't consent to your marriage with my son. I must save you from corruption. Go back to the ranch. I can see already signs of your deterioration. Except for your color and that grip you look like upper Broadway."

She flushed redly, conscious of her new corset, her silk stockings and her pinching shoes. "It's all on the outside," she declared. "Under this tawdry I'm the same old trapper. It don't take long to get rid of these things. I'm just playing a part today—for you."

He smiled and dropped her hand. "No, no. You've said goodbye to the city. I can see that. You're on the road to opera boxes and liaisons. What is your plan? What would you advise Wayland to do if you knew I was hard against his marrying you? Come, now. I can see you're a clear sighted individual. What can he do to earn a living? How will you live without my aid? Have you figured on these things?"

"Yes. I'm going to ask my father to buy a ranch near here, where mother can have more of the comforts of life and where we can all live together till Wayland is able to stand city life again. Then, if you want him to go, I will go with him."

They had moved slowly back toward the others, and as Wayland came to meet them Norcross said, with dry humor: "I admire your lady at the clutch hand. She seems to be a person of singular good nature and most uncommon shrewd."

Wayland, interrupting, caught at his father's hand and wrung it frenziedly. "I'm glad!"

"Here! Here!" A look of pain covered the father's face. "That's the last she put in the press."

They all laughed, and then he gravely resumed: "I say I admire her, but it's a shame to ask such a girl to marry an invalid like you. Furthermore, I won't have her taken east. She'd be lost out and lose that grip in a year. I won't have her contaminated by the city. He raised deeply while looking at his son. "Wouldn't life on a wheat ranch, accessible to this hotel by motorcar, be endurable to you?"

"You mean with Berrie?"

"If she'll go. Mind you, I don't advise her to do it," he added, interrupting his son's outcry. "I think she's taking all the chances." He turned to Mrs. McFarlane. "I'm old fashioned in my notions of marriage. Mrs. McFarlane, I grew up when women were helpmates, such as I judge you've been. Of course it's all guess work to me at the moment, but I have an impression that my son has fallen into an unusual run of luck. As I understand it, you're all out for a pleasure trip. Now, my private car is over in the yards, and I suggest you all come along with me to California."

"Governor, you're a wonder!" exclaimed Wayland.

"That'll give us time to get better acquainted, and if we all like one another just as well when we get back—well, we'll buy the best farm in the North-Platte, and"

"It's a cinch we get that ranch!" interrupted Wayland, with a triumphant glance at Berrie.

"Don't be so sure of it," replied the lumberman. "A private car, like a yacht, is a positive test of friendship. But his warning fell to the ground for the young lovers. They had entered upon certainties."

TEMPERANCE NOTES

(Conducted by the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union.)

LABOR FAVORS PROHIBITION.

Occasionally it is reported that some representative of the labor movement has made a statement reflecting upon the value of prohibition. That such statement does not voice the sentiments of the rank and file of the labor organizations is certain. Whole bodies of labor unionists have gone on record to favor of prohibition, and men in high official positions in the American Federation of Labor have been most emphatic and outspoken against the liquor business. The National Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, representing a membership of 70,000, passed a resolution in favor of prohibition, and the labor unions of Pasadena, Cal., sent out in the unions of the nation a plea to work and vote for the elimination of the saloon, urging the benefits they had experienced from being in dry territory. At the convention of the American Federation of Labor held in Toronto in the fall of 1914, despite the activity of a strong liquor lobby, the argument that the saloon is the "workingman's club" was emphatically repudiated.

To various ways and on many occasions the evil influence of the saloon has been recognized and pointed out by the labor unions of the United States. While the liquor interests have sought to coöperate the impression that there was some common interest between trade unionism and the manufacture and sale of intoxicants, this suggestion is repelled on every occasion when the matter is presented to the labor men in its true light and when the main purpose of the liquor interests is exposed to view.

John Mitchell of the United Mine Workers of America, and formerly Vice-President of the American Federation of Labor.

Who can deny that the liquor traffic is driving men and women to work in factories, workshops and wash-tubs who ought not to be there, and boys and girls into industrial life who should be in school or on the playground? The liquor traffic tends to decrease wages, never to increase them. The use of alcohol makes men less skillful and drives men to lower scales of employment and reward. Every cent spent in the liquor business is wasted. There is no redeeming feature in the saloon. Go anywhere where its influence is felt, and you see the demoralization it brings. The saloon is the enemy of the people. I am against it and will do all I possibly can to put it out of business."

John B. Lennon, Treasurer American Federation of Labor.

Almost every labor union scandal can be traced to the saloons. The downfall of labor union officers who get drunk, neglect their duties, embezzle the funds of the union or sell out the union, can be traced in almost every case to the saloon. It means disgrace to the union to have the shortcomings of its officers aired in the courts of the land and the loss of it the better for the labor union. Every labor union should fight the saloon with all its power.—John F. Cummen of the International Association of Machinists.

If you want to know where the miners of America stand upon the temperance question, I'll tell you. In our constitution we have a clause which forbids any member to sell intoxicants, even at a picnic. That's what we think of the liquor traffic. Some people say the saloon is a necessary evil. I don't believe in that kind of doctrine. Because the liquor traffic tends to enslave the people, to make them satisfied with improper conditions, and keeps them ignorant, the leaders of the trades unions are called on to fight the saloon.—Thomas L. Lewis of the United Mine Workers.

OSTEOPATHS REFUSE COCKTAILS.

When the delegates to the national osteopathic convention entered the blue room of the Multnomah hotel at Portland, Ore., prepared to enjoy a banquet, they stepped back in angry surprise. At each plate, was placed a cocktail, cooled with clipped ice and topped off with a marmalade cherry. The liquid ingredients contained a strong amount of alcohol. The osteopathic physicians refused to seat themselves at the banquet tables until every cocktail was removed. By which act, remarked the Union Signal, they showed themselves to be up-to-date scientists!

BEER AND WHISKY.

Because the symptoms of chronic alcoholism appear more slowly, and are less readily observable in the heavy beer drinker than in the whisky drinker, the former is by far more frequently met than the latter. But thousands and tens of thousands of men who take their daily pint are rendered stupid, silly and dissolute by beer.—Dr. Hugo Hoppe, Nerve Specialist of Koenigsberg, Germany.

PROPERTY VALUES CLIMBING.

Kansas property values went up over $75,000,000 in the last year. The state tax commission has completed the equalization of the assessment values of all the property in the state and fixed the state tax levy. All of the property was assessed at $2,881,347,525. The total valuation a year ago was $2,806,510,092.

Cold Settled In His Back

"Foley Kidney Pills always give me prompt relief."—Ed Veltion, Rogers, Neb. "I have used Foley Kidney Pills for backache, the result of catching cold which settled in my back. Foley Kidney Pills always give me prompt relief and I can cheerfully recommend them."

The reason Foley Kidney Pills act so satisfactorily is because they neutralize and dissolve the poisonous waste matter that remains in the blood because the kidneys do not do their work properly in filtering out casting out from the system uric acid and other poisons.

Relief usually follows in a few days and such symptoms as pain in the sides or back, stiff joints, sore muscles, rheumatism, too frequent action of the bladder at night, and other painful and annoying ailments disappear. Foley Kidney Pills contain no harmful ingredients. They are safe as well as quick acting.

Suffrage Notes

How Equal Suffrage Works in Kansas.

The state treasurer of Kansas, Earl Akers, wrote a remarkable letter during the recent suffrage campaign in New York telling how suffrage works in Kansas. He says:

"The advent of the women into state government in Kansas has passed the desire for better government up a bit higher. They naturally lean to the better side of moral issues."

"Our women are not persistent candidates for office and never have been. Last fall 82 per cent. of our women voted. None of them was a candidate for state office or the legislature. If you New York folks are tired of graft and waste in public business, give the women a chance and it is my guess you won't be long in getting your state to go well financially."

Franklin Chase Hoyt, presiding judge of the children's court, New York, says: "My experience in the courts has shown me that it would be better for the children if their mothers could have an equal voice in the framing of laws for their welfare and protection."

The brewers of Davenport, Iowa, have each donated $200, it is said, and the saloonkeepers $75 each to the fund being raised to defeat equal suffrage in Iowa.

Senators Cummins and Kenyon, Clifford Thorne, chairman of the railroad commission, and Senator Allen, Republican candidate for governor of Iowa, will speak for the suffrage amendment in that state.

"Women cannot have equal power with men in the industrial struggle while they are classified with idiots and irresponsibles in political affairs."—Jas. H. Maurer, President Pennsylvania Federation of Labor.

"Keep knocking at the door, girls, and let your brothers see That you are in the work to stay till polltially free."

The constitution, like the house, needs cleaning now and then, And the women folks will manage it much better than the men; And they'll have a thorough cleaning when once they do begin— Keep knocking at the door, girls, and you'll get in."

—Chicago Record of 1885. Reprinted by Woman's Journal.

Not the Usual Kind. "What a foul exercise fencing must be for women."

"Why so? I always understood it was fun."

"Here Maude Binks is taking lessons, and she told me yesterday she was learning how to fence."

"Do Your Christmas Shopping Early"

The above slogan in the hands of an astute business man changed the whole practice of Christmas shopping and stimulated holiday business as nothing else could have done. This man, with the nerve of a Barnum and the judgment of a Wanamaker, grabbed the thought from the public mind and put it into big BLACK TYPE where "He who runs may read"—in the newspaper! He backed a popular conviction with his coin and advertised the universal belief that it would be better for everyone concerned if the inevitable Christmas purchases were made at once while stocks were fresh and new and the choice was wide and ample.

The result not only paid the advertiser, as it always does—but the whole country profited beside.

This slogan has since slipped into practical use in every corner of commercial America. Excepting perhaps its fellow slogan "Safely First," which reduced the accident death rate enormously, it has done more good in the world than any business phrase ever coined. It has been the means of discontinuing the time-honored practice among large metropolitan department and specialty stores of keeping open in the evenings a week or two preceding Christmas Eve. It has enabled manufacturers to prepare their goods and fill orders far enough in advance to insure clear store rooms long before the Yuletide candles were lighted. It prevented the disappointment of millions of Christmas shoppers who were wont in times past to wait for the more attractive novelties which turned up at the last moment. And not the least important it saved the heartaches of neglected ones who leant upon the broken reed of mere man's thoughtlessness.

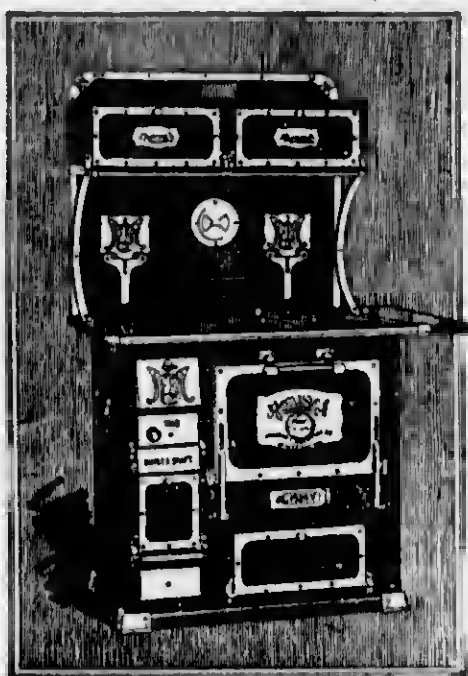

That phrase, "Do your Christmas Shopping Early," was instantly taken up and flung before the eyes of the world through the medium of its newspaper. Just as every other worth while thing is told this nation of readers by the ever present, constant, reliable all-knowing morning, evening, weekly or Sunday newspaper. Nothing the world does is done without ITS knowledge, nothing you want the world to know can be made known without its aid. Almost any national manufacturer will tell you that most of his fame and profit were the product of newspaper advertising. No newspaper advertising who kept it up wisely ever lost money.

The newspaper pays the advertiser. The latter merely invests in business publicity. The cost of advertising is like a phantom Zeppelin—it never lights anywhere. It is a bugaboo made of thin air and a yellow streak. The common supposition that advertising expense is levied upon the consumer is likewise a fallacy. The fact of the matter is that the non-advertiser PAYS for it out of the business he loses to competitors who do advertise.

Advertising doubles output, halves overhead, divides selling cost and, by making two customers buy where ONLY ONE BOUGHT BEFORE, it creates a hundred per cent increase in profit—out of which any business man can well afford to pay for his own advertising.

MORAL FOR MERCHANTS: Advertise in the CHARLEVOIX COURIER and do your Christmas BUSINESS Early.

The Monarch Malleable Range

People ought to give more thought to selecting a range than they usually do—because the range is the only thing in the house that directly affects your everyday living expense.

When buying a range you have the choice of many at many prices or you can keep on using your old wasteful stove. Why not give your judgment a chance to point out the right way? Come in and see our line of MONARCH Malleable Ranges. Give the matter the same thought you would if you were buying a $60.00 suit.

of clothes, a wagon, a piece of furniture. Ask us, "What it is made of? How it is built?" Get inquisitive. Look inside for the asbestos lining. Test the strength of its malleable iron parts. Dig around with your pocket knife for stove putty to see if its joints are made tight that way or by RIVETING so they stay tight.

The buyer who judges this way buys a MONARCH Range every time because he can see with his own two eyes its good points.

This advertisement is not to convince you that the MONARCH is the range you want, but to interest you to the point of coming in and seeing for yourself.

We are so enthusiastic about the MONARCH Range that it is a pleasure to show them even if you don't buy.

On account of poor health, Mrs. Joe Choon of this city left on Thursday of last week for Saginaw, where she will take treatment at the St. Mary's hospital. She was accompanied by her son, Frank, who will make Detroit his home during the winter.

Roy Ranger and Lance Neff broke all records last Saturday in the line of game killing. They drove to a swamp east of Phelps and in less than two hours killed ten jack rabbits and three cotton tails. They said there is plenty of game left in that vicinity, too.

The editor was dying, but when the village doctor bent over him, placed his ear on his chest and said: "Poor man. Circulation almost gone," the dying editor sat up and shouted, "You are way off; we have the largest circulation in the county." Isn't it so?

Manager Miles announces as one of the coming attractions at the Majestic, on the evening of December 8, "The High Hand," one of the best he has ever shown. Few moving pictures shows are giving their patrons the class of entertainment shown at the Majestic.

Sam Ross and family of Big Bay spent from Monday to Friday last week at the home of his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Andy Ross. Mr. Ross holds a responsible position with the Lake Independence Lumber company at Big Bay, thirty eight miles north of Marquette.

Tuesday evening of last week, November 23, Miss Montecese Holly, gave a five o'clock dinner to a number of her girl friends at her home on State street, the occasion being her 16th birthday. The rooms were very pretty decorated in the high school and freshmen class colors.

Gerald, the young son of Mr. and Mrs. Ed. Brock, was surprised by eight of his boy friends and teacher on Saturday last, the occasion being his eighth birthday. Several hours were spent playing games, after which delicious refreshments were served, this ending an afternoon long to be remembered by those present.

Notice

Notice is hereby given, That sealed proposals will be received by the City Clerk of the City of Charlevoix, at his office until four o'clock in the afternoon December 6th, A.D. 1915, for constructing a sewer and accessories, commencing at the north line of Dixon avenue on Nichols street, thence north on Nichols street to the south line of Petoskey avenue, thence northwesterly across Petoskey avenue and Michigan avenue to about 25 feet east of the west line of Michigan avenue to connect with the sewer therein established; also commencing at a point opposite the extension of the west line of Lot Five (5) Block Three (3) Dixon's Addition to the Village (now city) of Charlevoix on Ainslie street, thence east on Ainslie street to Nichols street to connect with the sewer therein to be laid. Plans and specifications of the work are on file and may be seen at this office. Instructions to bidders and bidding blanks will be furnished by the Clerk on application and all bids must be on the bidding blanks furnished by the clerk. The City of Charlevoix reserves the right to reject any or all bids and to award the contract as it may deem for its best interests. Dated December 1st, 1915.

Daily Christmas Hint

For Collars, Cuffs and Handkerchiefs

This pretty hint is a departure from the ordinary laundry box in that it is a thought more elaborate. However, it is made all of washable materials, so the cleanliness of it need not frighten anybody who wishes to give a useful Christmas gift. It was developed of very coarse linen and lined with a wash silk in any desired shade.

The silk showing through the square of drawn work very prettily drawn work is very easy to do in the corner. Let her's cheer and her's merry tidings.

It is reported that Jos. Dennis formerly of Atwood, but now of Medicine Hat, Canada, will in a short time return home to stay for good. "A rolling stone gathers no moss."

He who never had an enemy must have said nothing, done nothing and been nothing. And he has lost the opportunity for the development of character that a real live enemy gives one; even though it isn't quite as pleasant as to always have everything run smoothly.

The hunt and banquet pulled off last week was one of the most enjoyable events that has taken place in this vicinity for some time. Ed Klooster and John Newland were chosen as captains and made their selection of the "real live ones" in the hunting line of the neighborhood. The result of the day's sport was 38 rabbits and five partridge, the side captained by Klooster being the loser by 20 points. In the evening the feed was held in the town hall and was well attended. Klooster says that he will "show them" next year and is not in least chagrined by his defeat.

PLEASANTLY SURPRISED

Home of Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin Madill Scene of Big Gathering.

A pleasant surprise took place at the home of Benjamin Madill on Saturday evening, November 27, the occasion being the birthday of the Mr. Madill, which fell on November 27th, and of Mrs. Madill which occurred on November 28th.

Mr. and Mrs. Madill were at the neighbors when about 40 of their friends came and took possession of the home and when they returned were genuinely surprised.

As a token of the esteem in which they are held by their friends they were presented with an Aluminum set and other small dishes.

After lunch had been served and the evening spent all returned to their homes reporting a good time.

WRITING ON METALS.

By the Use of Wax and Acids Etching May Easily Be Made.

Usually a man attempts to put his name on his metal possessions by scratching with a file or knife point and makes the poorest sort of a job. It is really very easy to write on any metal—the blade of a jackknife, a watchcase, skates—if one happens to know how, and the attractiveness of the inscription is limited only by the artistic ability of the individual.

Cover the place where you wish to write with a thin coating of melted beeswax. When the wax is cold write plainly with any pointed instrument, being particular to cut the letters through the wax to the metal.

Then mix one ounce of muriatic acid and one-half of an ounce of nitric acid, or smaller quantities in the same proportions (and remember that those acids are deadly poisons), and apply the mixture to the lettering with a feather, carefully filling each letter.

Allow the acids to remain from one to ten minutes, according as the etching is to be light or deep. Next dip the article in water, wash out the acids and melt off the wax, and the thing is done. A little oil should be applied as a finishing touch. Gold, silver, iron or steel can be marked in this way. Youth's Companion.

Berthollet and Robespierre. It is said that the celebrated savant Berthollet in the most dangerous times of the republic sustained his fearless love of truth. Some days prior to the night Thorndike a sandy deposit was found in a barrel of brandy intended for the army. The contractors, suspected of poisoning, were immediately arrested, and the scaffold was already prepared. Berthollet, however, examined the brandy and reported it free from all adulteration.

"You dare maintain," said Robespierre to him, "that that brandy does not contain poison?"

As his reply Berthollet drank off a glass, saying, "I never drank so much before."

"You have plenty of courage!" exclaimed Robespierre.

"I had more when I signed my report," replied the chemist, and here the matter terminated.

Seventh Century Needlework. Before the end of the seventh century needlework was carried to great perfection in convents, where it was used for the establishment of the church and the decoration of priestly robes. Artists did not think it beneath their dignity to trace the patterns used for embroidery in their natural colors.

A certain religious lady, wishing to embroider a sacerdotal vestment, asked no less a personage than St. Dunstan, then a young man, but already noted for his artistic skill and taste, to draw the flowers and figures, which she afterward worked in gold thread.

Exchange.

Easily Arranged. A man took the following telegram to a telegraph office: "Mrs. Brown (Center Street) I announce with grief the death of Uncle James. Come quickly to read the will. I believe we are his heirs. John Black."

The telegraph clerk, having counted the words, said, "There are two words too many, sir."

"Cut out 'with grief,'" was the reply. —Chicago News.

In These Martial Days.

"You must not be so quarrelsome Willie," said William's father impressively. "Remember that the meek shall inherit the earth."

"Maybe they will hereafter," responded the young militant. "but around in my school they are used to wipe up the earth." —Chicago Herald.

A SAVING TO TAXPAYERS.

It is stated that the taxpayers of Polk county, Iowa, in which Des Moines is located, will save $19,000 by the closing of saloons. "Since the many thirst parlor have closed their doors and paid off their help the courts have taken a semivacation," says the Des Moines Capital. "Inebriate and insane asylums have taken down the 'Standing Room Only' signs and report that business is falling off something fierce." The levy for the state institution fund has been reduced for the first time in the history of Polk county. Last year the levy was 1 mill. Now it is .8 mills, a difference of .2 mills. The levy for court expense has been reduced .3 mills. Last year's figure was 3 mills. This year it is 2.7 mills. The net reduction for the two funds amounts to half a mill or $19,000.

"County officials explain the reduction in the court expense levy by the fact that dry conditions have greatly reduced the number of cases. When the saloons were running on all six cylinders, a big percentage of cases were of the intoxication variety. With the saloons running full blast, the county derived a revenue of $25,000. Taxpayers are now saving $19,000 with the bars out of business only nine months."

CAPITAL AND LABOR BENEFIT.

When the Brunswick-Balke-Coller company some time ago announced its intention of discontinuing the manufacture of bar fixtures, because there was no longer a demand for them since prohibition had closed so many saloons, the liquor press sent up a howl declaring that prohibition had thrown hundreds of men employed by this company out of work. Investigation has shown, however, that the company had received immense orders for Edison photograph cases and similar work and that not one man has been discharged as a result for the diversion of the work into different channels. Not only this, but it is asserted that the number of men employed will be increased rather than diminished, and the change is generally considered by business men of Dubuque as favorable to the labor market.

WHAT IS THE MATTER?

As one state after another outlaws the drink traffic the astonished liquor men ask, "What's the matter, anyway?" That question is easily answered. The thing that's all wrong is liquor itself, and the people are finding it out. The dispensary plan; the high license plan; the government owned saloon; the family liquor store; Sunday closing; early closing; strict supervision; abolishment of free lunch, music, tables and games; the system of having only one saloon to so many population; local option—all of these are mere subterfuges. They are quick remedies. They do not go to the root of the evil which is liquor itself. The only cure for the liquor evil is the complete prohibition of its manufacture and sale in the whole nation.—Kansas City (Mo.) Times.

NO NEED OF JAIL.

The following statement appears in the Mail of Los Gatos, a prohibition city in Santa Clara county, California: "During the last four months it has cost Los Gatos 75 cents per prison expense. One person was arrested during this period and 75 cents was paid to take him to the county jail at San Jose. This is a mighty good record for a city of 3,500 people. Another matter—Los Gatos has been without a jail for months."

SERMON ON TEMPERANCE.

Perhaps Kitchener, being an Irishman, was in the congregation when the priest gave the sermon on temperance which ended with the impressive words: "Drink is the ruin of the country. 'Tis drink that steals your wages. 'Tis drink that makes ye heat your wives. 'Tis drink that makes ye shoot at your landlord, and 'tis drink that makes ye miss him."—The Independent.

WEST VIRGINIA'S STAND.

"West Virginia," asserts Commissioner Fred O. Blue in a recent interview, "will never again permit the legalized sale of alcoholic beverages, and will never again enter into partnership with the liquor business."

"We will never go back to it for the purpose of raising revenue and it is an insult to the intelligence of our people to suggest it."

LIQUOR TRAFFIC AND FARMER.

If all the distilleries and breweries were closed the farmers' market for corn would not be affected. The liquor traffic uses less than 2½ per cent of the five leading grain crops of the land.

For every bushel of grain used by the breweries and distilleries more than forty-four and three-fifths bushels are used for legitimate purposes.

ALCOHOL A DEGENERATE.

There is no one drop of alcohol in nature. Alcohol is produced by decomposition of sugar, by leaven and ferment. It is of low birth, a degenerate. It is the decomposition of vegetables, fruits, grain or sawdust. It is the garbage of plant life; the offscour of vegetation's functional processes; the discarded elements of decayed life.—Doctor Eliebelberger.

RICHARDI TRIES TO EXPLAIN

Claims He Is In No Way Responsible for Present Lighting Contract.

Offers to Unload Steam Unit at Bellaire Upon City to be Operated at This End.

The following communication was received last Wednesday morning from Henry Richardi of Bellaire regarding the present lighting contract. The article arrived too late for publication last week, and, believing it fair and just to give the letter space, we present his viewpoint of the situation over his own signatures.

At a later date the Courier will go into the details of the matter more fully and it is our opinion that many facts yet unpublished will be the result of our investigations. The letter follows:

To the Electors and Taxpayers of Charlevoix:

In view of the attack made by both local papers in their last issue in November on the Bellaire power and light plant, it is evident that you are entitled to the facts in the matter, and, while the whole detail and history of our contract relations are too long to be put in a single article, I will here make a statement of some facts which will put you, the taxpayers, on enquiry and get you better informed on the whole matter. When the contract was made between your city and the undersigned a term of twenty years was insisted upon by your city, I only consenting to it on the conditions that the rate of prices to be paid by your city should be re-adjusted at the end of the first ten-year period of the contract and that such a readjusted rate of prices may be fixed by mutual agreement, or by a commission of three impartial arbitrators, as is provided for in the contract, shall prevail in the second ten-year period of the contract. My object for insisting on the above arrangement in contracting was that the matter of cost and expense of producing electric current at Bellaire and transmitting it to Charlevoix was largely experimental at that time, and then, too, the equipment for a twenty-year proposition is necessarily more expensive than for the shorter period. The legality of the twenty-year term of the contract was undertaken to be cared for by the city. What the city did is best shown by a special act of the legislature, the enacting clauses of which read as follows: "An Act to authorize the City of Charlevoix, in the County of Charlevoix and State of Michigan, to enter into contracts for the purpose of purchasing and receiving a supply of electric current for the use of said city and to be sold and furnished to the citizens thereof, to prescribe the terms for which such contract may run, and to ratify any and all such contracts heretofore made and entered into by said city."

And also a general act which the legislature passed for the benefit of all fourth class cities covers the legality of the city's light contract, to say nothing of the moral obligation involved in an attempt to break an agreement or contract, and which general act reads as follows: "The people of the State of Michigan enact: Section 1. The respective actions of the councils of all cities of the fourth class, granting franchises to, and making contracts with, persons or corporations, to use streets and public places for the supply of such cities or the inhabitants thereof, or both, with gas, electric, or other lights for periods of time exceeding ten years, but not exceeding thirty years, are hereby legalized and made valid." To my possessive knowledge there was no trickery or sly chamber details or secrets of any sort in connection with the passing of the contract or the special act upon my part. In view of the personal interests to be advanced by those who are promoting with their official counsel and advice the present agitation, I leave it willingly to the people of Charlevoix. You all know the former representative, the Honorable A. J. Stroud, and the Honorable Fitch R. Williams, neither of whose memory can be fairly assailed and do not warrant such insinuations as have recently been made in one of your local papers. At the time the light contract was made with the city of Charlevoix the city employed George S. Pierson, C. E. A. M., of Kalamazoo, to investigate this power proposition, and his report shows that he advised your city in the following language: "Interruptions in the power current as it is delivered to you through the various processes of generation, transformation, transmission and so forth are bound to occur. So far as these interrupt the operation of the lighting plant they are merely an inconvenience, but if they leave you without fire protection are hazardous." The above shows that your city was fully advised and aware of possible interruptions of current. It has been my aim to serve your city to the best of my ability. I have employed first class assistance and have given this business my personal attention almost constantly. I feel that up to this time I have given you as good service as is possible. Although some interruptions have occurred, it is a fact that many more have occurred on the light system of distribution within your city, where by chafing of limbs of the trees on the wires, the overloading of transformers and switches and many other causes tend to produce disturbances over which I have no control, for my responsibility ceases where my wire touches your city limits. Nevertheless, the Bellaire plant is usually held responsible for every wink in the light. About one month ago your electric light committee requested my presence in your city for the purpose of considering the price and arrangements that shall prevail during the succeeding ten years of our contract, commencing June 1, 1916. I advised the committee that if the conditions remained as they were in the past the price would have to advance, but if the city would consider a suggestion from me I would recommend it to buy my steam unit, consisting of a Sterling boiler, a Harris Corless engine and a Bullock generator. Each one of these parts is capable of delivering 600 horse power. The committee seemed to be favorable and requested me to come before the council with a proposition, to which I advised that if the council favored the plan to have an engineer and a committee come to Bellaire and examine the machinery first. The above steam unit supplied your city with electric current last summer very successfully and it can supply all the steam current required for a great number of years, especially so if placed in Charlevoix. I agreed that if the city of Charlevoix would buy this steam unit from me I would load it on cars at Bellaire for about 50 per cent. (Continued on page 4)

DEATH CAME VERY SUDDEN

William Hervis Stricku with Heart Failure While at Work.

Had Been a Resident of Bay Township Since 1868—Funeral Saturday.

The many friends of William Hervis of Bay township were shocked to hear of his sudden death Thursday afternoon while busy about his home.

Mr. Hervis was born August 2, 1840, in England and went to Canada with his parents when about two years old, where he lived until coming to the United States in 1860, locating in Southern Michigan, later going to Illinois, where he enlisted in Company K, 65th Illinois, serving until the close of the war, a little over three years.

In 1864 he was married to Abbie J. Corwin and came to Bay township, Charlevoix county, in 1868, where they took up a homestead, residing there until 1887, when they moved to Horton Bay, where they resided until the death of Mrs. Hervis in March, 1907. After that time his home had been with his daughter, Mrs. Rollo Long, Bay Shore. Mr. Hervis was a member of Lombard Post at Boyne City. Everyone will miss the kind and genial smile, as he was a very cheery and optimistic person. The only near surviving relatives are his daughter and her family.

Funeral services were held from the home Saturday at 10 n. m. Interment in Horton Bay cemetery.

JUDGE MAYNE FOR SUPREME BENCH

Antrim County Bar Association Pass Resolutions Endorsing Him.

Plan to Organize Active Campaign to Secure His Nomination and Election.

The following article taken from the Bellaire Independent in a manner shows the high regard in which Judge Mayne is held in that vicinity and it is needless to state that the bar association of that county will leave no stone unturned in their effort to land the judge on the supreme bench:

"At a meeting of the Antrim County Bar Association held December 1st it developed that there was a unanimous sentiment that Judge Frederick W. Mayne of this judicial circuit should be named to fill the position on the supreme bench left vacant by the death of the late Judge McAlvey, and the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"The personal qualifications and professional ability of our presiding judge, Frederick W. Mayne, being such as to especially commend him for a position on the supreme bench of our state, and in view of the geographical location of his residence and circuit, and the political history and distribution of public offices in our state and of the present membership of our supreme court, this part of the state is entitled by all considerations of right, justice and equitable recognition to name the candidate to fill the position on our supreme bench made vacant by the death of Justice McAlvey, who was elected from Northern Michigan.

"Be it resolved, That we, the members of the Antrim County Bar Association, who have had the pleasure of personal and professional acquaintance with Judge Mayne during his sixteen years as the presiding officer of our circuit court, and are well able to judge of his qualifications as a jurist, and appreciate the high qualities possessed by him, do hereby pledge our combined and individual support and endeavor to the end that Judge Mayne may be nominated and elected to the position of justice of the supreme court at the coming 1916 election."

Preliminary steps were taken towards organizing an active campaign to land the nomination for Judge Mayne at the coming state convention.

This action on the part of the bar association will meet with the approval of everyone in Antrim county.

SELLS HIS INTEREST

H. I. McMillan of East Jordan Disposes of Argo Milling Co. Holdings.

One of the most important changes since its organization was made in the stockholders and officers of the Argo Milling Company last week, when H. I. McMillan of East Jordan sold his interest.

Mr. McMillan first became identified with the old Charlevoix Roller Mills Company, with whom he held a responsible position for a number of years. He was one of the promoters of the Argo Milling Company, one of its original stockholders, and held the position as vice president at the time he disposed of his interest.

He was millling superintendent of both mills, and was resident manager of the East Jordan end of the company. The stock formerly held by him has been absorbed by G. D. Swinton, A. A. Swinton, James Bugart and Henry W. Partridge.

TIME TO PAY YOUR TAXES

Rate in the City a Little Higher Than That of 1914.

Enormous Increase in Amount Paid to the State—Figures That Will Surprise You.

Now is the season when the old wallet is brought to daylight and an inventory of his contents is taken to see if it contains enough to pay the rent due the town, county and state.

The treasurers of the cities and townships have received their tax rolls from their respective supervisors, and are now in a receptive mood for gathering in the shekels.

The inquiry always arises about this time as to "how this year's taxes compare with those of a year ago?" However, it makes little difference as far as paying up, and you might as well dig first as last.

Evidently our friend the governor has made good the prophecy of his campaign opponents in the wholesale signing of appropriation bills, as the amount paid to the state for taxes shows an enormous increase. The percentage paid to the state this year is .00297391, while in 1914 it was .00191831.

The county tax this year is one mill higher than last.

In Charlevoix the rate for 1915 is $17 per $1,000, in 1914 it was $16.92.

The following are the amounts raised in the city:

State tax: 1914, $4,536.68; 1915, $7,086.29. County tax: 1914, $9,459.78; 1915, $11,913.98. School and one mill tax: 1914, $18,909.56; 1915, $15,679.51. County road: 1914, $7,094.84; 1915, $1,765.50. City tax: 1914, $16,554.61; 1915, $19,065.82.

The total tax raised in this city for 1914 was $49,460.63, and for 1915, $54,745.66.

The total assessed valuation of the county in 1914 was $11,753,528; and for 1915, $11,759,619.

The total assessed valuation for the city in 1914 was $2,361,945, and for 1915, $2,382,095.

State Funds Gone.

With a scant $5000 in the general fund of the state treasury December 1 Michigan faced a financial crisis. Requests of state institutions for expense funds are being denied until January taxes are available. At the next meeting of the board of state auditors it is expected to arrange to borrow $200,000.

Auto Licenses for 1916 From $8.00 to $27.25

Ford Car Tax to be $9.25—Peerless* the Highest, with Others According to Horse Power.

Michigan's official "automobile blue book," the most portentous work of its kind in the country, was issued recently.

It is intended as an aid for Michigan auto owners in figuring out their license fees for next year. It contains the horse power rating and the weight of 1150 types of automobiles. Some of them date back to 1900, but the majority of them were built within the last three or four years. The data runs away back, as there are many second-hand cars in use in Michigan.

The figures are given by 80 manufacturers, of whom 77 quote on gasoline cars exclusively and three on electrics. The heaviest car on which actual figures are given is the American Mercedes. These are said to weigh 7488 pounds each. The 1915 Armleder is quoted at 6000 pounds, while the Thomas and the Locomobile quote 5000 pounds. The highest horse power quoted is

DEATH TAKES JOHN NICHOLLS

Charlevoix Mourns the Loss of One of Its Most Respected Citizens.

Had Been Ill But Four Weeks—Funeral Services Saturday at 10 A. M.

To-day Charlevoix mourns the death of Hon. John Nicholls, and this very fact is the best tribute that may be paid a man who has lived the years of usefulness Mr. Nicholls had.

There have been few men in Northern Michigan better known than Mr. Nicholls. He came to Charlevoix in 1874 and had since been identified with the growth and development of the city. About four weeks ago his health began to fail him and for the past two weeks he had been confined to his bed. Death came Wednesday morning at 4:30 o'clock. He was conscious almost to the end and bade farewell to the members of his family some time before death occurred.

The intimate role John Nicholls played in the business and social life of this community is well known. He was active to the moment his death sickness overtook him. Always he had been known as a busy man—busy in business; busy in charity; busy in those affairs which make for a better Charlevoix. This city has felt instinctively the qualities of fidelity to purpose; of fine public spirit; of a well-defined energy and industry directed by a mind strong and clear.

Hon. John Nicholls was one of the strongest men in this community. The kind of a man to whom citizens turned instinctively when they wanted good work done and work which once performed would stand because of its integrity. Such men are missed when they answer death's summons. John Nicholls will be missed from our daily life. He had worthily sustained the fine tradition of the best citizenship of Charlevoix.

Funeral services will be held Saturday morning at 10:00 o'clock from the Congregational church. In our coming issue will be published a life sketch of the deceased, which, on account of the short time between his departure and publication day, we are forced to omit.

ON BATTLESHIP KEARSARGE

Albert Yarema of Boyne Falls a Member of the Crew.

With the United States Marine Corps detachment on board the big navy fighter Kearsarge, now on patrol duty along the east coast of Mexico, is Albert Yarema of Boyne Falls, this county.

Albert, who is a son of Mrs. Mary Yarema, enlisted in the United States Marine Corps at Detroit, Michigan, February 16, 1914, and has had many interesting adventures during his service. Marines are always landed first when trouble threatens and they go to all parts of the world in the performance of duty.

Young Yarema is widely known in this community and his many friends will wish him the best of luck while serving with the "soldiers of the sea."

THE CHARLEVOIX STATE SAVINGS BANK Landis Christmas Savings Club

THE LOGIC OF IT IS THIS:

Most people need more Money Christmas than they can spare. Some people who expect to have the money they will need are disappointed in some way or other. There is a way to avoid it all:

Our Landis Christmas Savings Club is a co-operative movement to provide against such contingencies. The Dimes, Nickles and Pennies you allow to slip through your fingers each week, for the things of little use or value, will keep up the payments. You never miss the dimes but when Christmas comes you have the money. It's just like so much Insurance. Make it a sure thing by becoming a Member. Below it is explained.

Members starting with 5c and increasing 5c each week for 50 weeks get - - - - -	Members starting with 2c and increasing 2c each week for 50 weeks get - - - - -	Members starting with 1c and increasing 1c each week for 50 weeks get - - - - -

You need not necessarily spend it all for Christmas presents. The accumulations can be used for school work, payment of taxes, insurance or the necessities of life or part of it can be transferred to our regular Savings Department and then earn 4 per cent interest. It is a good start. Try it. Club starts Monday, December 20th.

A FOOL AND HIS MONEY

BY GEORGE BARR McCUTCHEON.

Copyright, 1915, by George Barr McCutcheon.

PROLOGUE.

"Who is she?"
"How did she get there?"
These are the questions the Fool asked of the caretaker of the venerable castle of that high handed old robber baron, the first of the Rathoefens.
And these are the questions the interested reader starts to ask and keeps on asking while Author McCutcheon develops one of the most mysterious, humorous and sprightly stories that ever came from his pen.
"Who is she?"
"How did she get there?"
Read on and you will find much entertainment as well as the answer to these pertinent queries.

CHAPTER I.

I Make No Effort to Defend Myself.

I AM quite sure it was my Uncle Elias who said that I was a fool. His memory serves me well he believed himself of that conviction in the presence of my mother—whose brother he was—at a time when I was least competent to acknowledge his wisdom and most arrogant in asserting my own. I was a freshman in college, a fact—or condition perhaps—which should serve as an excuse for both of us. I possessed another uncle, incidentally, and while I am now convinced that he must have felt as Uncle Elias did about it, he was one of those who suffer in silence.

I assume, therefore, that it was Uncle Elias who orally convicted me, an assumption justified to some extent by putting two and two together, after the poor old gentleman was laid away for his long sleep. He had been very emphatic in his belief that a fool and his money are soon parted. Up to the time of his death I had been in my way qualified to dispute this ancient theory. In theory, no doubt, it was the kind of fact he referred to, but in practice I was quite an untrained novice. It is very hard for even a fool to part with something he hasn't got. Not until Uncle Elias died and left me all of his money was I able to demonstrate that dead men and fools part with it.

In any event Uncle Elias did not leave me his money until my freshman days were far behind me, whereas the source that he may have obtained an opinion while I was going through the same process. At twenty-three I confessed that all freshmen were insufferable and immediately afterward took my degree and went out into the world to convince it that seniors are by no means adolescent.

My uncle's original estimate of me—as a freshman, of course—was uttered when I at the age of eighteen picked out my walk in life, so to speak. After considering everything I decided to be a literary man—a novelist or a play writer. I hadn't much of a choice between the two, or perhaps a journalist being a journalist, of course, was preliminary, a sort of makeshift. At any rate it was going to be a writer. My Uncle Elias, a hard headed customer, who had read Scott as a boy and the Wall Street News as a man without being misled by either, was scornful. He said that I would outgrow it; there was some consolation in that. He even admitted that when he was seventeen he wanted to be an actor. There you are; said he.

I argued that novelists make a great deal of money and playwrights, too, for that matter. He said in reply that an ordinarily vigorous washerwoman could make more money than the average novelist and she always had a stocking without a hole to keep it in which was more to the point.

Now that I come to think of it, it was Uncle Elias who orally convicted me and not Uncle John, who was by way of being a sort of literary coach himself and therefore lamentably unqualified to guide me in my course whatsoever, especially as he had all the world to keep his own wolf at bay without encouraging mine and who besides possessing good English loved it in itself and too well.

My mother felt in her heart that I ought to be a doctor or a preacher, but she wasn't much. She was positive I could succeed as a writer if I set my mind to it. She was also sure that I could be president of the United States or perhaps even a bishop. We were Episcopalians.

him a glimpse of the clock when I got it.
In course of time my first novel appeared. It was a love story. Uncle Elias read the first five chapters and then skipped over to the last page. Then he began it all over again and set up nearly all night to finish it. The next day he called it "crash," but invited me to have luncheon with him at the Metropolitan club and rather nobly introduced me to a few old cronies of his.

A month later he died. He left me a fortune, which was all the more staggering in view of the circumstance that had seen me named for my Uncle John and not for him.

It was not long afterward that I made a perfect fool of myself by falling in love. It turned out very badly. I can't imagine what got into me to want to commit bigamy after I had already proclaimed myself to be irreversibly wedded to my profession. Nevertheless I deliberately coveted the experience and would have attained to it had I not been for the young woman in the case. She would have none of me, but with considerable independence of spirit and, I must say, noteworthy common sense, elected to wed a splendid looking young fellow who clerked in a jeweler's shop in Fifth Avenue. They had been engaged for several years. It seems, and my swollen fortune failed to disturb her sense of fidelity. Perhaps you will be interested enough in a girl who could refuse to share a fortune of something like $300,000 (not counting me, of course) to let me tell you briefly who and what she was. She was my typist—that is to say, she did piecework for me as I happened to provide subsistence for her active fingers to work upon when she wasn't typing law briefs for the regular sort of grad. Not only was she an able typist, but she was an exceedingly wholesome, handsome and worthy young woman.

Someday I was able to attribute this to an inborn sense of shyness that had always made me faint hearted, dilatory and unassertive. No doubt if I had gone about it roughly and boldly I could have played hob with the excellent jeweler's piece of mind to say the least.
Still, some men, no matter how shy and procrastinating they may be, or reluctant, for that matter—are doomed to have love affairs thrust upon them as you will perceive if you follow the course of this narrative to the latter end.

In order that you may know me when you see me struggling through these pages, as one might struggle through a morass on a dark night, I shall take the liberty of describing myself in the best light possible under the circumstances.

I am a tallish sort of person, moderately homely and not quite thirty-five. I am strong, but not athletic. Whatever physical development I possess was acquired through the ancient and honorable game of golf and in swimming. In both of these sports I am quite proficient. My nose is rather long and inquisitive, and my chin is considered to be singularly firm for one who has no ambition to become a hero. My stomach is abundant and quite black. So there you are. Not quite what you would call a lady killer or even a lady's man I fancy you'll say.

You will be surprised to learn, however, that secretly I am of a rather romantic, imaginative turn of mind. Since earliest childhood I have consorted with princesses and ladies of high degree—mentally, of course—and my bosom companions have been knights of valor and longevity.

At thirty-five I am still unattached and, so far as I can tell, unloved. For the past year I have done little or no work. My books are few and far between. My best work is done when the madding crowd is far from me.

A month ago, in Vienna, I felt the plot breaking out on me, very much as the muskies do, at a most inopportune time for everybody concerned, and my secretary, more wide awake than you'd imagine by looking at him, urged me to evade the miss while she was will ing.

It was especially annoying coming as it did, just as I was about to set off for a fortnight's idyllic trip up the Danube with Elsie Hazzard and her stupid husband, the doctor.

The fourth day of our delectable excursion brought us to an ancient town whose name you would recall if I were fool enough to mention it and where we were to put up for the night. On the crest of a stupendous crag over looking the river almost opposite the town which lay far from Krems, stood the venerable but unrenovated castle of that high handed old robber baron the first of the Rathoefens.

We picked up a little of its history while in the town and the next morning passed over to visit the place. The antiquity was considerably enhanced by the presence of a caretaker who would never see eighty again and whose wife was even older. Their two sons lived with them in the capacity of loafers and, as things go in these rapid times of ours, appeared to be even older and more averse than their parents.

It is a winding and tortuous road that leads up to the portals of this huge old pile. Halfway up the hill we paused to rest, and I quite clearly remember growling that if the confounded thing belonged to me I'd build a funicular or install an elevator without delay.

The next day instead of continuing our delightful trip down the river we three were scurrying to Salzburg, urged by a sudden and stupendous whim on my part and filled with a new interest in life.

I had made up my mind to buy the castle.
At the end of three days I was the sole owner and proprietor of a feudal stronghold on the Danube, and the joyous Austria who had owned it was a little farther on his way to the dogs, a journey he had been negotiating.

The Venerable Castle of That High Handed Old Robber Baron, the First of the Rathoefens.

ing with great ardor ever since coming into possession of an estate once valued at several millions.

To make the story short, the Hazzards and I returned to Schloss Rathoefen in some haste, primarily for the purpose of inspecting it from danger to settlement. An interesting concession on the part of the late owner, the gentleman hurrying to catch up with the dogs that had got a bit of a start on him, may here be mentioned. He included all of the contents of the castle for the price paid, and the deed, or whatever you call it, specifically set forth that I, John Bet lamy Smart, was the sole and undivided owner of everything the castle held.

Our second and more critical survey of the lower floors of the castle revealed rather urgent necessity for extensive repairs and refurbishing, but I was not dismayed. With a blithesome disregard for expenses I dispatched Rudolph, the elder of the two sons, to Linz with instructions to procure artists who could be depended upon to undo the ravages of time to a certain extent and who might even suggest a remedy for leeks.

My friends, abhorring rheumatism and like complaints, refused to sleep over night in the drafty, almost paneless, structure. They came over to see me on the ensuing day and begged me to return to Vienna with them. That, full of the project in mind, I would not be moved. With the house full of carpenters, blacksmiths, masons, lock smiths, tinmiths, plumbers, plasterers, glaziers, joiners, scrubwomen and chimney sweeps, I felt that I couldn't go away and leave it without a controlling influence.

Just as they were leaving my secretary and my valet put in an appearance, having been summoned from Vienna the day before. I confess I was glad to see them. The thought of spending a second night in that thin less bedchamber with all manner of night birds trying to get in at the windows, was rather disturbing, and I welcomed my retainers with open arms.

My first night had been spent in a huge old bed carefully prepared for occupancy by Herr Schmidt's frau. I knew there was a ceiling, for I had seen its beams during the daylight hours, but to save my soul I couldn't imagine anything so far away as it seemed to be after the candles had been taken away by the caretaker's wife, who had tucked me away in the bed with simple propriety and thoroughness combined.

Twice during that interminable night I thought I heard a baby crying. So it is not unreasonable to suppose that I was not too glad to see Hoppen dyke, my secretary, clambering up the path with his typewriter in one hand and his green baize bag in the other followed close behind by Britton, my valet, and the Gargantuan brothers bearing trunks, bags, boxes and my golf clubs.

"What?" said Hoppendyke, dropping wearily upon my doorstep.
My secretary is a youngish man with thin, sloping shoulders and a habit of being passed over to visit the place. The

PEOPLE from all over the country are urging their congressmen to pass a more drastic law governing the acts of the many plotters in the country who are constantly making attempts at blowing up factories where ammunition is being made. These plots all have German origin, and the law suggested is to be so drastic that anyone without even taking part in the plot but who knows of their existence will be executed as traitors and their property confiscated unless they promptly report full information of the plots to the state government in which they live and to the federal government at Washington.
The demand is for a law so drastic that it will end this plotting business with a mailed fist and an iron heel. This great republic has no place for a traitor even in times of peace.

SOME people are now economizing for Christmas by adjourning payment of the grocer's bill until after New Year's.

AFTER buying the Christmas presents

of what it cost me, which price would be about 25 per cent. of what a new steam unit of this capacity would cost now. My object in making this proposition was to be relieved of the summer electric load, which is in excess of what the water power will produce. This excess summer load must be produced with steam and it would be much cheaper to make it in Charlevoix than in Bellaire and transmit to your city. With your city owning a plant of this capacity you would at all times be prepared to handle the electric load successfully and by relieving me of the steam load would make you a very low price on the water power. Another reason for yielding a part of my business is to realize on this steam unit and use the money out of it to purchase a new style of hydro-electric unit which is claimed will give a greater amount of power with the same amount of water now used, but to which a steam unit cannot be connected. Such a hydro-electric unit costs about $10,000 installed and with the present investment of about $75,000 in this plant it would not be policy to make an additional investment unless I can sell a part of the present plant.
Nor would it be policy to have a part of my present business diverted so long as I carry the investment of the steam unit. It is very commendable in your council to endeavor to make the cheapest possible arrangement for your city.
However, the plan now under contemplation may be the costliest in the end, whereas if you would install the steam unit you would have something tangible and something that would be dependable for a great number of years. Further, you would be working in harmony with the Bellaire plant, which is really a creation of your own, it being installed upon your solicitation, and is operated almost exclusively for you. If you would employ an unbiased engineer I think my above suggestions would be more fully appreciated.

Respectfully yours,

Henry Richardi.

School Commissioner's Notes

Received twelve reports from the just what to do to be standard.

The school had six little windows.
But three they moved one day,
And now it has a wall of light
To the left and east, they say.
It's wondrous light and cozy!
'Twas done for the children's sake,
But now they don't dare whisper.

People Like Our Baked Goods

Our special sale on Raisin Bread last Saturday brought a large number of people to our store. They like our baked goods and all spoke in the highest terms of the quality of goods we make. This bake shop is a home institution and deserves the patronage of every home in Charlevoix. Our bread is as good as can be made—no better is on the market in Charlevoix today. This week we will give another special—buy with the crowd and patronize a home concern.

SATURDAY SPECIAL 8c
Fried Cakes, per dozen

Beginning with Saturday we will start the stamp deal.
Stamps will be given with every 10c purchase. To start it out, we will give 10 extra stamps with every purchase of 10c or more on Saturday of this week. To get the benefit of bread bought at grocery stores, bring in the whole wrapper and we will redeem them here. Twenty of these stamps are good for one admittance to local theatre.

perpetually rubbing his knees together when he walks.

"It is something of a climb, isn't it?" said I beamingly.

"In the name of heaven, Mr. Smart, what could have induced you to?" He got no farther than this, and to my certain knowledge this unflinching refusal was the nearest he ever came to openly convicting me of insanity.

"Make yourself at home, old fellow," said I in some haste. I felt sorry for him. "We are going to be very cozy here."

"Cozy?" murmured he, blinking.

"I haven't explored those upper regions," I explained nervously, divining his thoughts. "We shall do it together in a day or two."

"It looks as though it might fall down if we jostled it carelessly," he remarked, having recovered his breath.

"I am expecting masons at any minute," said I, contemplating the unstable stone crest of the northeast turret with some uneasiness. My face brightened suddenly. "That particular section of the castle is uninhabitable, I am told. It really doesn't matter if it collapses. Ah, Britton! Here you are. I see. Good morning."

Britton, a very exacting servant, looked me over critically.

"Your coat and trousers need pressing, sir," said he. "And where am I to get the hot water for shaving, sir?"

"Frau Schmick will supply anything you need, Britton," said I, happy on being able to give the information.

"It is not I as needs it, sir," said he, feeling of his smoothly shaved chin.

"Come in and have a look about the place," said I, with a magnificent sweep of my arm to counteract the feeling of utter insignificance I was experiencing at the moment.

A day or two later the castle was swarming with workmen. The barking of hammers, the rasp of saws, the splintering of mortar, the crashing of stone and the fumes of charcoal crucibles extended to the remotest recesses. The tower of babel was being reconstructed in the language of six or eight nations.

Poupenyke, in great distress of mind, notified me on the fourth day of rehabilitation that the cost of labor as well as living had gone up appreciably since our installation. In fact it had doubled. He paid half of my bills, so I suppose he knew what he was talking about.

"You will be surprised to know, Mr. Smart," he said, consulting his sheets, "that scrubwomen are getting more here than they do in New York city and I am convinced that there are more scrubwomen today than we had thirty new ones scrubbing the loggia on the gun room floor, and they all seem to have apprentices working under them. The carpenters and plasterers were not so numerous today. I paid them off last night, you see. It may interest you to hear that their wages for three days amounted to nearly $700 in our money, to say nothing of materials and breakage."

"Breakage?" I exclaimed in surprise.

"Yes, sir, breakage. They break nearly as much as they mend. We'll be bankrupt, sir, if we're not careful."

I liked his pronoun. "Never mind," I said; "we'll soon be rid of them."

"By the way," he said, "old man Schmick and his family haven't been paid for nearly two years. They have put in a claim. The late owner assured them they'd get their money from the next."

"Discharge them at once," said I.

"We can't get on without them," protested he. "They know the ropes, so to speak, and what's more to the point they know all the keys. Yesterday I was nearly two hours in getting to the kitchen for a conference with Mrs. Schmick about the marketmen. In the first place, I couldn't find the way, and in the second place all the doors are locked."

"Please send Herr Schmick to me in the kitchen," I couldn't recall the name of the administration chamber at the head of the grand staircase, so I was compelled to say "I'll see him here."

"If we lose them we also are lost," was his sententious declaration. I believed him. We kept the Schmicks.

On the fifth day of our occupancy Britton reported to me that he had devised a plan by which we could utilize the tremendous horse power represented by the muscles of those lazy giants, Rudolph and Max. He suggested that we rig up a huge windlass at the top of the helix, with stout steel cables attached to a small car which could be hauled up the cliff by a derrick, and used as a hoist, and as we readily lowered it, a counter force and I understood him to have the extraordinary railway built, but to be sure that the safety device, which in the car wheels were sound and trusty.

That evening after the workmen had filed down the steep looking for all the world like an invincible army I caught a few moments of peace and quiet in the small balcony outside my bedroom windows. My room was in the western wing of the castle, facing the river. The eastern wing mounted even higher than the one in which we were living, and was topped by the loftiest watch tower of them all. We had not attempted to do any work over in that section as yet, for the simple reason that Herr Schmick couldn't find the keys to the doors.

Suddenly I found myself staring at a figure at the white figure of a woman who stood in the topmost balcony of the eastern wing, fully revealed by the lust glow of the sun and apparently as deep in dreams as I had been the instant before.

CHAPTER II. I Defend My Property.

FOR ten minutes I stood there staring up at her, completely bewildered and not a little shaken. My first thought had been of ghosts, but that was almost instantly dispelled by a significant action on the part of the suspected wraith. She turned to whistle over her shoulder and to snap her fingers peremptorily, and then she stooped and picked up a rather lusty chow dog, which promptly barked at me across the intervening space, having discovered me almost at once, although I was many rods away and quite snugly ensconced among the shadows. The lady in white muzzled him with her hand, and I could almost imagine I heard her reproving whippers. After a few minutes she apparently forgot the dog and lifted her hand to adjust something in her hair. He again barked at me, quite ferociously for a chow. This time it was quite plain to her that he was not barking at the now shadowy moon. She peered over the stone balustrade and an instant later disappeared from view through the high, narrow window.

Vastly exercised, I set out in quest of Herr Schmick, marshaling Poupenyke as I went along, realizing that I would have to depend on his German, which was less halting than mine and therefore more likely to dovel with that of the Schmicks, neither of whom spoke German because they loved it, but because they had to, being Austrians. We found the four Schmicks in the vast kitchen.

"Herr Schmick," said I, "will you be so good as to inform me who the dickens that woman is over in the east wing of the castle?"

"Woman, mein herr?" He almost dropped his keys.

"A woman in a white dress, with a dog."

"A dog?" he cried. "But, mein herr, dogs are not permitted to be in the castle."

"Who is she? How did she get there?"

"Heaven defend us, sir! It must have been the ghost of—"

"Ghost, your granny!" I cried, re-peating into English. "Please don't beat about the bush, Mr. Schmick. She's over there in the unnaid wing, which I haven't been allowed to penetrate in spite of the fact that it belongs to me. You say you can't find the keys to that side of the castle. Will you explain how it is that it is open to strange women and—dogs?"

"You must be mistaken, mein herr," he whined, abjectly. "She cannot be there. She—Ah, I have it! It may have been my wife, Gretel! Have you seen her in the east?"

"Nonsense!" I cried sharply. "This won't do, Mr. Schmick. Give me that bunch of keys. We'll investigate."

The four Schmicks wrung their hands and shook their heads and then, replying to the scullery, growled and grumbled for fully ten minutes before deciding to obey my commands. In the meantime I related my experience to Poupenyke and Britton.

"That reminds me, sir," said Britton, "that I found a rag doll in the courtyard yesterday, on that side of the building, sir—I should say castle, sir."

"I am quite sure I heard a baby crying the second night we were here, Mr. Smart," said my secretary nervously.

"Come!" said I finally, grabbing the keys from the old man's unresisting

Two Abreast We Filed Through the Long, Vaulted Halls.

hand. "And, Schmick, if that dog barks I'll hold you personally responsible. Do you understand?"

Two abreast we filed through the long vaulted halls, the old man carrying a lantern and I a stick.

We traversed extensive corridors, mounted tortuous stairs and came at length to the sturdy oak door that separated the east wing from the west—a huge, formidable thing strengthened by many crosspieces and studded with rusty bolt heads. Padlocks as large as horsehooves, corroded by rust and rendered absolutely impracticable by age, confronted us.

"I have not the keys," said old Conrad Schmick sourly. "This door has not been opened in my time. It is no use."

"It is no use," repeated he grimly, leaning against the moldy walls with weary tolerance.

"Smash those padlocks, Max," I commanded resolutely.

Very reluctantly Max bore his great arms, split upon his hands and, with pitiful look at his parents, prepared to deal the first blow upon the ancient padlock. But the padlock merely shed a few scales of rust and rattled back into its customary repose.

"See!" cried Max, triumphantly. "It cannot be broken."

"It is a very fine lock," cried old Conrad, with a note of pride in his voice.

I began to feel some pride in the thing myself. "It is, indeed," I said.

"It seemed to me that he struck with a great deal more confidence than he for, but without result."

"Give me the hammer," I said in desperation. Max surrendered the clumsy, old fashioned instrument with a grin and I motioned for them all to stand back. Three successive blows with all the might I had in my body failed to shatter the lock, whereupon my ebullient rose to heights hitherto unknown, I being a very mild mannered, placid person and averse to anything savouring of the tempestuous. I delivered a savage and resounding thwack upon the broad oak panel of the door, regardless of the destructiveness that might attend the effort. If any one had told me that I couldn't splinter an oak board with a sledge hammer at a single blow I should have laughed in his face. But as it turned out in this case I not only failed to split the panel, but broke off the sledge handle near the head, putting it wholly out of commission for the time being as well as bringing my hands so severely that I doubled up with pain.

The Schmicks fairly glowed with joy! Afterward Max informed me that the door was nearly six inches thick and often had withstood the assaults of huge battering rams, back in the dim past when occasion induced the primal baron to seek safety in the east wing, which, after all, appears to have been the real, sinuous pure fortress.

As we trudged back to the tower halls, defeated, but none the less impressed by our failure to devastate our stronghold, I was struck by the awful barrenness of the surroundings. There suddenly came over me the shocking realization—the "contents" in the bill of sale, were not what I had been led to consider them.

"Herr Schmick," said I, abruptly halting my party in the center of the hall, "what has become of the rugs that were here last week and where is that pile of furniture we had back yesterday?"

Old Conrad was not slow in answering.

"The gentlemen called day before yesterday, mein herr, and took much away. They will return tomorrow for the remainder."

"Gentlemen?" I gasped. "Remainder?"

"The gentlemen to whom the baron count sold the rugs and chairs and chests and—"

"What?" I roared. Even Poupenyke jumped at this sudden exhibition of wrath. "Do you mean to tell me that these things have been sold and carried away without my knowledge or consent? I'll have the law!"

Herr Poupenyke intervened. "They had bills of sale and orders for removal of property dated several weeks prior to your purchase, Mr. Smart. We had to let the articles go. You surely remember my speaking to you about it."

"I don't remember anything," I snapped, which was the truth. "Why, then, I bought everything that the castle contained. This is robbery! What the dickens do you mean by?"

Old Conrad held up his hands as if expecting to pacify me. I spluttered over the rest of the sentence, which really amounted to nothing.

"The count has been selling off the lovely old pieces for the past six months, sir. Ah, what a sin. They have come here day after day, these furniture buyers, to take away the most precious of our treasures, to sell them to the poor rich at twenty prices I could weep over the sacrifices have wept, haven't I, Gretel? Eh, the dolph? Buckets of tears have I shed mein herr. Oceans of them. Time after time have I implored him to deny these recently stolen treasures, these bloodsuckers!"

"But listen to me," I broke in. "Do you mean to say that articles have been taken away from the castle since I came into possession?"

"Many of them, sir. Always with proper credentials, believe me. Ah, what a splendid thief he is! And his poor wife! Ah, Gott, how she must suffer. Nearly all of the grand paintings, the tapestries that came from France and Italy hundreds of years ago, the wonderful old bedsteads and tables that were here when the castle was new—ah, gone! And for mere coins, such as here the cheapest of coins!—"

"Please don't weep now, Herr Schmick. I made haste to exclaim, seeing my distress. Symphonies in my head and eyes. Then I became firmer and said: 'Then I assume responsibility now. This kitchen must ever be at my disposal. The person who next man who comes here to—' be kicked out. Do you understand? These things belong to me. Kick him into the river. By Jove, I'd like to wring that rascal's neck! A conati! Umph!"

"Ah, he is of the noblest family in all the land!" sighed old Gretel. "His grandfather was a fine man." I contrived to subdue my rage and disappointment and somewhat loudly returned to the topic from which we were drifting.

"As for those beastly padlocks, shall have them filed off tomorrow, give you warning, Conrad. If the keys are not forthcoming before noon tomorrow I'll file 'em off, as help me!"

"They are yours to destroy, mein herr, God knows!" said he dlamly. "It is a pity to destroy due old padlocks."

"Well, you wait and see," said I grimly.

His face beamed once more. "Ah, I forgot to say that there are padlocks on the other side of the door, just as on this side. It will be of no use to destroy these. The door still could not be forced. Mein Gott, how thankful I am to have remembered it in time!"

"Confound you, Schmick! I believe you actually want to keep me out of that part of the castle!" I exploded.

The four of them protested manfully, even Gretel. "I have a plan, sir," said Britton. "Why not place a tall ladder in the courtyard and crawl in through one of the windows?"

"Splendid! That's what we'll do!" I cried enthusiastically. "And now let's go to bed! We will breakfast at 8, Mrs. Schmick. The early bird catches the worm, you know."

"Will you see the American ladies and gentlemen who are coming tomorrow to pick out the—"

"Yes, I'll see them," said I, compressing my lips. "Don't let me oversleep, Britton."

"I shan't," said he.

But I did. "Get up, sir, if you please," Britton repeated the third time. "The party of Americans is here now, sir, rummaging about the place."

"Where is Poupenyke?" I cried, leaping out of bed.

"Mr. Poupenyke is in despair, sir. He has tried to explain that nothing is for sale—but the gentlemen say they are into his game. They go right on yanking things about and putting their own prices on them and reserving them."

"I'll put a stop to all this," I grated, seeing red for an instant.

"And the ladies, sir? There are three of them, all from New York city, and they keep on saying they are completely overjoyed, sir. Your great alderboard in the dining room is to go to Mrs. Riley-Werkelmer, and the hall seat that the first baron used to throw his armor on when he came in from—"

"Great snakes!" I roared. "They haven't moved it, have they? It will fall to pieces!"

"No, sir. They are piling scones and candleholders and andirons on it, regardless of what Mr. Poupenyke says. You'd better hurry, sir. Here is your collar and necktie."

"I don't want 'em. Where the dickens are my trousers?"

His face fell. "Being pressed, sir. God forgive me."

"Get out another pair, command you, Britton! What are we coming too?"

He began rummaging in the huge clothespress, all the while regaling me with odes from the regions below.

"Mr. Poupenyke has gone up to his room, sir, with his typewriter. The young lady insisted on having it. She spluttered with joy at seeing an antique typewriter, and he had to run away with it, poor my soul be did, sir."

I couldn't help laughing.

"And your golf clubs, Mr. Smart. The young gentleman of the party is perfectly carried away with them. He says they're the real thing, the genuine sixteenth century article. They are a bit rusted, you'll remember. I left him out in the courtyard trying to throw his brass and andirons, sir, endeavoring to left potatoes over the south wall. I succeeded in hitting the bulls, sir. Just as I started upstairs I caught one of the new window panes in the banquet hall smash, sir, so I take it he must have shed his driven a bit.

"What of those people?" I demanded in sudden panic, from the depths of der to gain time by unbuttoning a collar.

"They came in with the plumbers, sir, at half past 8. Old man Schmick tried to keep him out, but they said they didn't understand German and walked right by, leaving their donkeys in the roadway outside."

"Couldn't Rudolph and Max stop them?" I asked as my head emerged.

"They were still in bed, sir. I think they're at breakfast now."

"Good Lord!" I groaned, looking at my watch. "Nine thirty! What sort of a rest cure am I conducting here?"

We hurried downstairs so fast that I lost one of my bedroom slippers. It went clattering on ahead of us, marking a shameful racket on the bare stones, but Britton caught it up in time to save it from the clutches of the curio vandals.

Two gentlemen wearing fedoras were standing in the middle of the great hall discussing the merits of a dingy old sconce that had been carried out of the main room by two lusty porters from the hotel.

As I came up I heard one of the strangers say to the other:

"Well, if you don't want it I'll take it. My wife says it can be made into a writing desk with a little."

"I beg your pardon, gentlemen," said I, confronting them. "Will you be good enough to explain this intrusion?"

They stared at me as if I were a servant asking for higher wages. The speaker, a man with a bristly mustache and a red necktie, drew himself up haughtily.

"Who are you?" he demanded, glaring me with a glare.

BACKACHE IS A WARNING

Charlevoix People Should Not Neglect Their Kidneys.

Backache is often nature's most frequent signal of weakened kidneys. To cure the pains and aches, to remove the lameness when it arises from weakened kidneys, you must reach the cause—the kidneys. If you have pain through the small of your back, urinary disorders, headaches, dizzy spells, or are nervous and depressed, start treating the kidneys with a tested kidney remedy.

Doan's Kidney Pills have been proved good and are especially for weak kidneys. Doan's have been used in kidney trouble for over fifty years. Read this Charlevoix testimony—

Mrs. W. L. Cowan, 210 Antrim street, Charlevoix, says: "I don't hesitate to recommend Doan's Kidney Pills, for I have had good results from them. I had a severe backache and pains in my kidneys and was also annoyed by the kidney secretions. I used Doan's Kidney Pills, procured at the Ivy Drug Store, and they brought me great relief."

Price 50c, at all dealers. Don't simply ask for a kidney remedy—get Doan's Kidney Pills—the same that Mrs. Cowan had. Foster-Milburn Co., Props., Buffalo, N. Y.

THIS YEAR DO NOT FAIL

To take up the question of your reading matter with us. If the above list does not appeal to you come in and we will quote you money-saving prices on any magazine or paper published. These are the greatest newspaper bargains ever offered by any newspaper in Northern Michigan. It has always been our aim to save Courier readers all we could on their reading matter. This fall we are doing even better than before. We also give cut rates on all magazines, daily papers and trade magazines. The saving usually runs about 15 per cent, but in some instances it will amount to more. Keep in mind at all times that we can and will save you money on your newspaper and magazine subscriptions. These rates are absolutely cash propositions as they must be paid in advance.

ALCOHOL CAUSES INSANITY.

Alcoholism, propagated by every nation, licensed by the state, is second only to war as a cause of insanity. Not only does it lead directly to mental disease, but it indirectly predisposes to mental and physical deterioration through heredity. Children of alcoholic parents are notoriously liable to epilepsy, imbecile or insane.—William Brady, M. D., Chicago.

SEVERAL ISSUES.

There are several other issues in the hearts of the people that tower above all others and are bound to be written into some party platform two years hence. One of these questions is that of national prohibition. You might as well try to sweep back the tides of the ocean as to stop or delay the progress of the prohibition movement.—Governor Carlson of Colorado.

SUBSTITUTE FOR VODKA.

As a substitute for the vodka shops, which have been abolished, there have been erected in the open places throughout Russia "people's palaces" and smaller buildings, where the people may meet for entertainment and instruction. These palaces contain rooms and halls in which concerts, exhibitions and other entertainments can be given.

Ole Poems Re-Writ.

When the frost is on the pumpkin

And lies glittering on the lawn

It is hard to face the winter

If your overcoat is in pawn.

Sometimes family complications make conversation rather embarrassing.

"How much like you your little girl is,

Mrs. Brown," remarked an acquaintance who met them on the street one day.

"How odd that you should think so," replied Mrs. Brown. "She's my husband's child by his first wife." "Indeed,

A-a-at n-w events I don't think I am wrong in saying your little boy is the image of Mr. Brown." "He's my son by my first husband, Mr. Green."

"Ah, yes. Good afternoon, Mrs. Brown."

The old soldier was telling of his thrilling adventure on the field of battle to a party of young fellows, one or two of whom were skeptical as to his veracity.

"Then," he said, "the surgeons took me up and laid me carefully in the ammunition wagon and "Look here," interrupted one of the doubtful listeners,

"You don't mean the ammunition wagon.

You mean the ambulance wagon."

But the old man shook his head. "No," he insisted, "I was so full of bullets that they decided I ought to go in the ammunition wagon."

School Reports

Atwood School

Fanny Petter is able to be in school again.
The little folks are making Christmas drawings.
The percentage of attendance for the month is 94.
Cornelius VanHarten was absent from school Thursday.
The primary grades are making preparations for Christmas.
The sixth grade are learning "The Landing of the Pilgrims."
Albert Harwood, our director, did some repairing the first of the week.
The per cent. of attendance for the girls in the primary room last month was 99.
The boys and girls are pleased to see the snow on the ground and are having fun snowballing.
Our school building could be made more attractive and convenient by the addition of some new curtains.
We have just commenced work on our Christmas program which we expect to give on Christmas evening at the town hall.

The seventh grade are glad to add to their number George Allen, who entered school Monday. George is living with Elmer Seymour.
The following pupils of the grammar grades were neither tardy nor absent for the month ending November 26: Jake Essenburg, Jennie Fyn, Effie Fyn, Henry Essenburg, Gertrude Van Houten and Persis VanDerStreek.

Mapleville School

We are busy preparing for a Christmas program.
Five pupils were neither absent nor tardy this year.
So far this year we have had only one case of tardiness.
Thirteen pupils were neither absent nor tardy this month.
Our school report for November days taught 20; total attendance 460; daily average 23; enrollment 25; percentage attendance 92.
Our school has become interested in the movement against the "Great White Plague" in Michigan. "Christmas Red Cross Seals" were received from the State Tuberculosis Society, and we are doing our best to sell them, not only to benefit those who already have the disease, but also to protect ourselves and others who are apt to contract it. So few realize what a hold the disease already has throughout the United States, and in buying the seals think they are only helping others when in reality you are helping others, your children and yourself. If you will, you can help check the disease, by buying the seals of the children.

Wright School District

Henry Meyers is in school again after two weeks absence.
Snowballing and coasting are the favorite sports these days.
Roy Campbell entered school Tuesday and took up fifth grade work.
Mrs. C. E. Bearss visited school on Friday and helped with our Christmas songs.

Temperance

(Conducted by the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union.)

ALCOHOL AND ATHLETICS.
Prof. Irving Fisher of Yale university has issued a pamphlet in which he gives the result of his investigations of the liquor problem. Concerning alcohol and athletics he says:
"In studying the conditions of health and efficiency during the last ten years, the conditions which enable an athlete, for instance, to be at his best, I have had occasion to examine the conflicting popular ideas concerning alcohol. I began the study quite willing to be convinced that alcoholic beverages have some virtue. But I have ended in the conviction that they have none, and I have found that this conclusion is almost universally reached by those who have examined the facts. Those facts demonstrate that a man who takes alcohol, in even a moderate degree, is harming himself physically, mentally, morally and economically."
"That alcohol increases fatigue is now commonly recognized by athletes. Alcohol gives no increase of muscular power. It is not what we can properly call a stimulant, but a depressant. It is apparently a stimulant, because it puts to sleep the nerves that indicate fatigue, so that the person thinks himself relieved of fatigue. What it does is to make one unconscious of his fatigue. Various kinds of tests and exercises have proved that alcohol is a decided hindrance to muscular or athletic power."

ALCOHOL CAUSE OF WAR.
Dr. Charles Gilbert Davis, eminent physician, psychologist and scientist of Chicago, says the great world war is but the logical outcome of "generations of alcoholic saturation, with the resultant deterioration of the human race and degeneration of the human mind."
"I have taken a kennel of Great Danes," says the doctor, "magnificent animals, and given them just a teaspoonful of alcoholic beverage daily, mixed with their foods, and then bred them, and carried on the experiment for five or six generations, until the Great Danes had dwindled physically to small size, and their even dispositions had changed until the product has been snarling, whining, fighting curs. How much more so this must be with humans extended over thirty or forty generations. The parallel may not be pleasant, but it is a nice one, and that is what has occurred in Europe."

JOHN BARLEYCORN UNPOPULAR.
"Insurance people have come to the definite conclusion that booze and insurance mix about as well as oil and water," remarked Edward A. Woods, president of the National Life Underwriters' association. "In other words," said Mr. Woods, "a drinking man is a mighty poor risk. Cold figures have proved to us positively that the drinking man—even the moderate drinker—has less than half as much chance to live out the life of his policy as the teetotaler. The mortality of the teetotalers between the ages of thirty-five and fifty years, when men are of the most use to society, is only 56 per cent of the average mortality. Not even the war has been the subject of as much consideration among insurance men as has the liquor question."

GERMANS DRINKING TEA.
Encouraging testimony as to the decreased consumption of alcohol in Germany was given Miss Mary E. Brown, director of the National W. C. T. U. exhibit at the Panama-Pacific exposition, by an engineer who showed great interest in the literature exhibit. He said that with 46 other engineers he visited Germany two years ago. While there the group investigated eight manufacturing plants and they found the men taking a pint bottle of weak tea with their one o'clock lunch instead of using beer with 2 or 3 per cent alcohol as formerly. The tea is prepared in the building and sent up in bottles at about one-half the cost of beer. Since substituting tea for beer the efficiency of the workmen has increased from 15 to 20 per cent.

Necessity has no law.
"I wish I could afford to own an automobile," remarked Brownsmith, who was one of a spin in Philadelphia's tour.
"I wish I had a car," replied Fimb.
"I wish I had a car," replied Fimb.

"I have given Foley Cathartie Tablets a thorough trial, and from the results obtained, I can honestly recommend them as a mild but sure laxative. They work without griping." Wm. O. R. Bielek, Hancock, Mich.

Sometimes you feel so heavy and stuffed up, so uncomfortable and bilious-like, with a mean headache, nervous, unreal and thick furry tongue. Your system is clogged, your bowels are not eliminating freely, your vital resistance is lowered and your system becomes more susceptible to the germs of disease.

Foley Cathartie Tablets relieve this condition over night, with no unpleasantness and no residue after-effects. They are the ideal laxative and those who depend upon them for results are the healthy, happy, care-free people who have no headaches, no biliousness, and who can enjoy both the work and the pleasure that comes into their lives. Your druggist sells them.

COUNTY NORMAL.
(Florence Milner.)

Miss Hazel Richardson was absent on account of illness last Tuesday.

Miss Marcella Goss was absent from school on Thursday of last week.

The second number of the Teachers' Reading Circle was held in the normal room last Saturday.

The class have just completed some interesting work in the making of alphabet cards to be used in the work of the chart classes.

The class have planted for the winter the bulbs which they ordered from the Children's Flower Association, in Cleveland. They were placed in the "cold frame" and will remain until spring.

Excited? Well who wouldn't be, if they were choosing an emblem to represent the most pleasant and interesting year of their life? The class ordered their emblems last week from Mr. Harrison Wallace, the representative of the Quayle Company. The class had more variety than former graduates. Some members getting pins, other rings, and some La Vallieres.

Wednesday morning, the normal class enjoyed a talk given by Mr. J. H. Milford, in the assembly room. Mr. Milford is deputy game warden of the state. He told us of the value of conservation, the help each one could give in this service, and the result if we failed to feel our responsibility along this line. We feel sure that Mr. Milford is very much interested in the boys and girls of Charlevoix county.

NOWLAND SCHOOL NOTES

Earl Williams is again in school after an absence of two weeks.

Winnifred and Albert Cunningham are absent from school because of illness.

The pupils are enjoying the book entitled "Little Women," which the teacher is reading.

Wm. Williams left Wednesday morning for Afton, where he will visit with friends for a few weeks.

The children are enjoying the snow. They are able to play many new winter games, and those of the early months are forgotten.

The pupils are much interested in current events. Time is given each Friday afternoon for discussion of the various topics chosen.

There were twelve certificates of award given out last month, and the beginning of the new month promises a larger number for next time.

C. H. S. RECEIVES RECOGNITION

From The University of Chicago at a Recent Meeting.

Pupils Entering University Will Not Be Required to Take Examination.

The Charlevoix High School has received another recognition of its high scholarship. Supt. H. A. Craig is in receipt of a letter from Dr. Nathaniel Butler of the Chicago University, in which he states that: "It gives me pleasure to inform you that the Board of Admissions of the University of Chicago at a recent meeting voted to approve your high school for the relationship with the University. I hope this will afford you as much satisfaction as it does us."

The University of Chicago has a department known as Co-operation with Secondary Schools. The university is very anxious to raise the standard of the secondary schools, and to keep in touch with them. Certain standards are set which must be met by all schools that are recognized by the university as co-operating schools.

Pupils entering the university from co-operation schools are not required to take any examination. It also gives our high school the privilege of nominating one senior each year for a honor scholarship at the University of Chicago. It also gives us the privilege of sending one boy and one girl to the annual contest in public speaking held at the University of Chicago.

It also gives us privilege of securing the advice of the members of the co-operative board, in reference to any matter of school administration that might come before the people of Charlevoix. As these men have the best information on the problem in school administration, their suggestion would be of great value.

The people of Charlevoix should feel proud that the high school is maintaining such a high standard, and should be willing in the near future to introduce new and better courses than we now have. Schools may cost money but they are worth all they cost. Schools are always in the process of evolution, and Charlevoix wants to meet the growing needs of the twentieth century.

MET WITH MRS. MILNER

W. C. T. U. Held Regular Meeting Friday, December 10.

The Women's Christian Temperance Union which met December 10, with Mrs. Thomas Milner, was largely attended and interesting. The devotionals were conducted by Rev. L. C. Vinyard. The High School orchestra gave a fine number which was duly appreciated.

Mr. Vinyard presented to the union the plan now being carried out of fitting up a place where the young people may spend a portion of this time in reading, and clean amusements and that if the union desired to help in the work, it would be appreciated. It was moved that the union help out in some way. Further discussion as to helping out was left until the next meeting.

This being a "mothers' meeting," a number of readings bearing on different phases were listened to which proved interesting. The union considered themselves fortunate in being able to see and listen to a really live missionary, Miss Kipp, who was in the foreign field for several years, but who on account of broken health has been recuperating in this country for some time and expects to return to the mission field in the near future. Miss Kipp labored in Aligarh, India, and her experiences there were many and varied.

The W. C. T. U. work is not confined to this country alone, but also in that far-off country as well. The "white ribbon" encircles the globe.

Extended Night Letter Service.

On and after December 10th, Western Union night letters will be accepted up to 2:30 a. m. instead of up to midnight as heretofore. UNION SERVICE WELL ATTENDED Fine Program Rendered Under Auspices of W. C. T. U.

U. S. Congressman and Senators Asked to Support Move for National Prohibition.

The union service at the Methodist church Sunday evening, December 12, under the auspices of the Women's Christian Temperance Union was largely attended. Orchestra, special music and addresses were features of an small importance. Marching song by the children, "The Children's Happy Day," and "The Fight Is On," by 19 young ladies representing the 19 dry states, were especially interesting. "Prohibition Is in the Air," by the Baptist young people, and a solo by Dr. F. H. Wilkinson added much to the program. The reading of the proclamation for constitutional prohibition was made by Miss Jessie Hines. An address by Rev. C. E. Tiggart, "Triumph Progress Toward National Constitutional Prohibition," took us back to almost the beginning of the temperance reform, relating some facts as long ago as 1810, showing conclusively the great progress since that time along temperance lines.

Rev. Lloyd C. Vinyard's topic was: "Personal Responsibility for Final Victory." All should do their part and not give up the fight till victory is won.

The decorations about the pulpit and platform of crepe paper were tastefully arranged. Pennants bearing the names of the 19 dry states and the year of their becoming dry were strung on wires overhead.

Rev. Quinton Walker when called on to present the resolution for national prohibition asked A. L. Coulter to give some statistics, which showed up how

24-Page Christmas Number

The Courier management takes a considerable amount of pride in presenting to its readers a 24 page Christmas number, filled with bright and newsy advertising from the first page to the last. There has never been a Christmas season in the past eight years that this publication has not carried the bulk of the newspaper advertising for the local merchants. The reason for this is obvious: The Courier guarantees the largest paid-up circulation of any paper published in Charlevoix county; it guarantees the publication each week of more and better local news matter, of country correspondence, than any other paper in the county. Its circulation is well distributed in practically every part of the county and it is read and liked by the very best farmers and townpeople.

The Courier management also wishes to acknowledge at this time its thanks to the merchants whose advertising appears in this issue, especially to those who are weekly advertisers, for the liberal support they have given us. No paper can be successful unless it has the backing of the entire community, and we feel in the presentation of this number that we have the backing and goodwill of the entire community.

The Courier is growing not only in regard to circulation, but as the only live advertising medium in this part of the county. The Christmas number of 1915 is the largest and contains more advertising than any paper ever published outside of cities of the size of Traverse City and Cadillac. It is as much the QUALITY as the QUANTITY of the Courier circulation that makes it a valuable medium for advertising.

Again we thank you for your patronage and goodwill extended us during the past year. We will try to show our appreciation by making an effort to give you a better and newsier paper each issue. We sincerely wish you a Merry Christmas and a Most Prosperous and Happy New Year.

much less liquor was consumed from July of 1914 to July of 1915 than in the year before, all going to prove that prohibition is bound to win, even if churches and all temperance organizations should cease working. Prohibition has received such an impetus that it would come anyhow.

When the resolution was read probably 400 or more people rose to their feet, thereby approving of this resolution.

If there is one particular time of the year when the public should read advertisements more thoroughly and more closely than any other time it is during the few weeks preceding Christmas. Business houses that will not advertise at any other time will pay for space just now to tell you what they have for the holiday trade. Our paper just now represents a directory to which you may turn at any time and learn what our local dealers have to offer you as suitable Christmas presents. It is a weekly catalogue, the pages of which you may turn and have placed before your eyes the merchandise you would find by a thorough, tiresome walk through all the stores. The condition of fall pasture as compared with an average per cent. is 96 in the state, 97 in the southern counties, 93 in the central counties, 97 in the northern counties, and 98 in the upper peninsula.

The condition of live stock throughout the state is 97 for horses, cattle and sheep, and 94 for swine.

FUNERAL WEDNESDAY

Friends and Neighbors Pay Last Tribute to Mrs. J. H. Cutler.

Mrs. Catherine Cutler, wife of J. H. Cutler, died at her home, 210 W. Huribout avenue, Saturday evening shortly before midnight after an illness covering a period of over five weeks.

Deceased was born May 31, 1838, and had been a resident of Charlevoix for some fifteen years. She was married to J. H. Cutler on June 15, 1903. Deceased is survived by her husband, a son who lives at Ogden, Washington; a half sister and a grandchild, who was at her bedside until forced to return to her home in Philadelphia on account of sickness.

Funeral services were held from the house to-day (Wednesday) at 10 a. m., Rev. Quinton Walker officiating. The remains will be placed in the vault at Brookside, awaiting the arrival of near relatives.

FARM HOUSE BURNS

Fire Destroys Fine Farm Residence of William Ferguson.

The fine farm home of William Ferguson, about six miles north-east of Charlevoix on the Petoskey road, was totally destroyed by fire between seven and eight o'clock Monday morning.

Mr. Ferguson had arose quite early and started a fire in the stove, laid down on a couch and went to sleep again. He was aroused by neighbors who had seen the fire issuing from the upper part of the house. Practically everything on the first floor was saved and part of the contents in the cellar. Little could be done to save the house and the flames fanned by the high wind soon consumed the entire structure.

The house and contents were covered by insurance.

Broke His Ribs

Sunday forenoon, when about to enter his barn, Albert O'Brien, a well known farmer of Hayes township, slipped on the icy approach and fell, with the result that he is now confined to his bed with several fractured ribs. Dr. R. B. Armstrong reduced the fractures and Mr. O'Brien is getting along as well as could be expected.

"Sani," said May Irwin to her colored butler, "do you mean to vote on November 2nd?"

"Cose I means to vote," Sani answered promptly.

"What do you know about the constitution?" asked May.

"Law now, Miss May," said Sani, "you don't have to be a doctor to vote."—Woman's Journal.

A wife in New Jersey does not have anything to say about where she shall live, according to a decision made November 17 by the state court of appeals at Trenton. The wife had objected to living in rooms already occupied by her husband's mother. The husband brought suit for divorce and the court sustained the decision on the ground that it is not the right of the wife to say where she shall live. It may be that in New Jersey the question has not been fully settled as to whether women have a right to live at all.

In a poll of the members of congress made by the Chicago Herald on the subject of equal suffrage both of the Michigan senators and most of the representatives from Michigan are recorded as in favor. Our own congressman, F. D. Scott, is "on the fence." He should be persuaded that he better "land" on the side of human justice.

Recently at the Republican "love feast" held in honor of Senator Cummins of Iowa, Senator Kenyon, who was presiding, said: "When a year has rolled around the women of Iowa will be voting." It will be a hopeful day for the good of the commonwealth when a like statement can be made regarding the women of Michigan.

Women nurse us in infancy; they educate us; they teach our children; in the main they run our churches; they are our counselors—to them we turn for advice which is most valuable to us in temptation and trial. I am quite content to trust their judgment at the polls.—Representative James R. Mann, Illinois.

Christmas Savings Club

THE LOGIC OF IT IS THIS:

Most people need more Money Christmas than they can spare. Some people who expect to have the money they will need are disappointed in some way or other. There is a way to avoid it all:

Our Landis Christmas Savings Club is a co-operative movement to provide against such contingencies. The Dimes, Nickles and Pennies you allow to slip through your fingers each week, for the things of little use or value, will keep up the payments. You never miss the dimes but when Christmas comes you have the money. It's just like so much Insurance. Make it a sure thing by becoming a Member. Below it is explained.

Members starting with 5c and increasing 5c each week for 50 weeks get - - - - -	Members starting with 2c and increasing 2c each week for 50 weeks get - - - - -	Members starting with 1c and increasing 1c each week for 50 weeks get - - - - -

SYNOPSIS.

John Bellamy Smart, unmarried and heir to a fortune, while abroad with his secretary, Poopendyke, and his valet, Britton, buys a dilapidated old castle on the Danube, in care of the Schmucka, and discovers a mysterious woman inhabiting one of the towers.

Smart fails to batter down a huge door leading to the east wing in search of the fair lady. He interrupts a visit of American relic hunters.

CHAPTER III.

The Real Owner.

I KNEW at once that he was the kind of an American I have come to hate with a zest that knows no moderation—the kind that makes one ashamed of the national melting pot. I glared back at him.

"I happen to be the owner of this place, and you'll oblige me by clearing out."

"What's that? Here, here, none of that sort of talk, my friend! We're here to look over your stuff, and we mean business, but you won't get anywhere by talking like that."

"There is nothing for sale here," I said shortly. "And you've got a lot of nerve to come bolting into a private house!"

"Say," said the second man, advancing with a most insulting scowl, "we'll understand each other right off the reel, my friend. All you've got to do is to answer us when we ask for prices. Now, hear that in mind, and don't try any of your high and mighty tactics on us."

"Just remember that you're a junk dealer and we'll get along splendidly," said the other in a tone meant to crush me. "What do you ask for this thing?" tapping the dusty spinet with his walking stick.

It suddenly occurred to me that the situation was humorous.

"You will have to produce your references, gentlemen, before I can discuss anything with you," I said, after swallowing very hard. (It must have been my pride.)

They stared. "Good Lord!" gasped the bristly one, blinking his eyes. "Don't you know who this gentleman is? You—your name is an American name. You must know Mr. Riley-Werkheimer of New York."

"I regret to say that I have never heard of Mr. Riley-Werkheimer. I did not know that Mrs. Riley-Werkheimer's husband was living. And may I ask who you are?"

"Oh, I am also a nobody," said he, with a wink at his purple-jawed companion. "I am only poor old Rocksworth, the president of the—"

"Oh, don't say anything more, Mr. Rocksworth," I cried. "I have heard of you. This fine old spinet? Well, it has been reduced in price—Ten thousand dollars, Mr. Rocksworth."

"Ten thousand dollars? I'll take it at $75. And now let's talk about this bare hall seat. My wife thinks it's a fake. What is its history, and what sort of guarantee can you give?"

"A fake?" I cried in dismay. "My dear Mr. Rocksworth, that is the very hall seat that Pontius Pilate sat in when waiting for an audience with the first of the great Teutonic barons. The treaty between the Romans and the Teutons was signed on that table over there, the one you have so judiciously selected. I perceive. Of course you know that this was the Saxon seat of government. Charlemagne lived here with his court."

They tried not to look impressed, but rather overdid it.

"That's the sort of story you tell always put up, you skunkhairs from Boston. I'll bet my head you are from Boston," said Mr. Rocksworth sardonically.

"I couldn't afford to have you lose your head, Mr. Rocksworth, so I shan't take you on," said I merrily.

"Don't get fresh now," said he still. Mr. Riley-Werkheimer walked past me to take a closet look at the seat, almost tripping on my toes rather than give an inch to me.

"How can you prove that it's the genuine article?" he demanded curtly. "You have my word for it, sir," I said quietly.

"Fishy!" said he. Mr. Rocksworth turned in the direction of the banquet hall.

"Carrie," he shouted, "come here a minute, will you?"

"Don't shout like that, Orson," came back from the porcelain closet. "You almost made me drop this thing."

"Well, drop it and come on. This is important!"

I wiped the moisture from my brow and respectfully put my clinched fists into my pockets.

couldn't by any circumstance of fate have been anybody's wife but Rocksworth's. "It's filthy! What do you want?"

"I've bought this thing here for seventy-five. You said I couldn't get it for a nickel under a thousand. And—" say, this man tells me the hall seat here belonged to Pontius Pilate!"

"Pardon me," I interrupted. "I merely said that he sat in it. I am not trying to deceive you, sir."

"And the treaty was signed on this table," said Mr. Riley-Werkheimer. He addressed himself to a plump young lady with a distorted bust and a twenty-two inch waist. "Maude, what do you know about the Roman-Teutonic treaty? We'll catch you now, my friend," he went on, turning to me. "My daughter is up in ancient history. She's an authority."

Miss Maude appeared to be racking her brain. I undertook to assist her. "I mean the second treaty, after the fall of Nuremberg," I explained.

"Oh," she said, instantly relieved. "Was it really signed here, right here in this hall? Oh, father, we must have that table!"

"You are sure there was a treaty, Maude?" demanded her parent wearily.

"Certainly," she cried. "The Teutons ceded Alsace-Lorraine to—"

"Pardon me once more," I cried, and this time I pleaded guilty to a blush. "You are thinking of the other treaty—the one at Metz, Miss Riley-Werkheimer. This, as you will recall, antedates that one by—oh, several years."

"Thank you," she said, quite condescendingly. "I was confused for a moment. Of course, father, I can't say that it was signed here on this table as the young man says. I only know that there was a treaty. I do wish you'd come and see the first screen I've found!"

"Let's get this out of our system first," said her father. "If you can show me statistics and the proper proof that this is the genuine table, young man, I'll—"

"Pray rest easy, sir," I said. "We can take it up later on. The facts are—"

"And this Pontius Pilate seat," interrupted Rocksworth, doing off the end of a fresh cigar—"what about it? Got a match?"

"Get the gentleman a match, Britton," I said, thereby giving my valet an opportunity to do his exploding in the pantry. "I can only affirm, sir, that it is common history that Pontius Pilate spent a portion of his exile here in the sixth century. It is reasonable to assume that he sat in this seat, being an old man unused to difficult stairways. He?"

"Buy it, Orson," said his wife, with authority. "We'll take a chance on it if it isn't the right thing we can sell it to the secondhand dealers. What's the price?"

"A thousand dollars to you, madam," said I.

They were at once suspicious. While they were busily engaged in looking the seat over as the porters shifted it about at all angles I stepped over and ordered my workmen to resume opera house.

"Here!" roared Mr. Rocksworth. "Stop this hoarse noise! What the deuce do you mean, sir, permitting these scoundrels to raise the dead like this?"

I moved toward apologetically. "They are raising the dead. The place is fairly alive with dead rats and—"

"Good Lord!" gasped Riley-Werkheimer. "We'll get the baboon plague here!"

"Well, let's move on upstairs," said Rocksworth. Addressing the porters, he said, "You fellows get this lot of stuff together, and I'll take an option on it. I'll be over tomorrow to close the deal, Mr. Mr— Now, where is the old Florentine mirror the count was telling us about?"

"The count?" said I, frowning. "Yes, the real owner. You can't shut me with your talk about being the proprietor here, my friend. You see we happen to know the count."

They all condescended to laugh at me. I don't know what I should have said or done if Britton had not returned with a box of matches at that instant.

Almost simultaneously there appeared in the lower hall a lanky youth of eighteen.

"Say, these clubs are the real stuff, all right, all right. They're as brittle as glass. See what I did to em. We can have 'em spiced and rebound and I'll hang 'em on my wall. All I want is the heads, anyhow."

He held up to view a headless and iron-pointed brass club, triumphantly waving a splendid one. My favorite.

and, as for the trou, I was dead with it.

He lit a cigarette and threw the match into a pile of shavings. Old Conrad returned to life at that instant and stamped out the luciferous blaze.

"I shouldn't consider them very good clubs, Harold, if they break off like that," said his mother.

"What do you know about clubs?" he snapped, and I at once knew what class he was in at the preparatory school.

If I was ever like one of them, said I to myself, God rest the sage soul of my Uncle Hims!

The situation was no longer humorous. I could put up with anything but the mishandling of my devoted golf clubs.

Striding up to him, I snatched the remnants from his hands. "You infernal cub!" I roared. "Haven't you any more sense than to smash a golf club like that? For two cents I'd break this putter over your head."

"Father," he yelled indignantly. "who is this mucker?"

Mr. Rocksworth bounced toward me, his cane raised. I whirled upon him. "How dare you?" he shouted. The ladies squealed.

If he expected me to cudge he was mightily mistaken. My blood was up. I advanced.

"Taste him, dad!" roared Harold. But Mr. Rocksworth suddenly altered his course and put the historic treaty table between him and me. He didn't like the appearance of my rather brawny fist.

"You big stuff!" shouted Harold. Afterward it occurred to me that this inelegant appellation may have been meant for his father, but at the time I took it to be aimed at me.

Before Harold quite knew what was happening to him he was practicing down the long hall with my bony fingers grasping his collar. Coming to the door opening into the outer vestibule.

"How dare you?" he shouted.

I drew back my foot for a final aid to locomotion. Acutely recalling the fact that slippers are not designed for kicking purposes, I raised my foot, removed the slipper and laid it upon a tuft section of his trousers with all of the melancholy force that I usually exert in slicing my drive off the tee.

I shall never forget the exquisite spasm of pleasure his plaintive "Ouch!" gave me.

Then Harold passed swiftly out of my life.

Mr. Rocksworth, re-enforced by four reluctant mercenaries in the shape of porters, was advancing upon me. Somehow I had a vague but unerring instinct that some one had fainted but I didn't stop to inquire. Without much ado I wrestled the cane from him and sent it scuttling after Harold.

"Now get out!" I roared. "You shall pay for this!" he spluttered, quite black in the face. "Grab him, you infernal cowards!"

But the four porters slunk away, and Mr. Rocksworth faced me alone. Rudolph and Max, thoroughly fed and most prodigious, were bearing down upon us, accounting for the flight of the mercenaries.

"Get out!" I repeated. I am the owner of this place, Mr. Rocksworth and I am mad through and through. Skip!"

They skipped.

CHAPTER IV.

I Converse With a Mystery.

LATE in the afternoon I opened my door, hoping that the banishing of hummers and the buzz of industry would have ceased; but, alas, the noise was even more deafening than before. Esyphing Britton in the gloomy corridor, I shouted to him, and he came at once.

"Britton," said I as he closed the door, "do you think they will carry out their threat to have the law of me? Mr. Rocksworth was very angry—and put out. He is a power, as you know."

"I think you are quite safe, sir," said he. "Shortly before 2, sir, one of the porters, from the hotel came over to deliver a gold purse. Mrs. Riley-Werkheimer had dropped in the excitement, and he informed Mr. Poopendyke that the whole party was leaving at 4 for Dresden."

Later on, sir, I refreshed and—

We have remarked many times before in this column that there seems to be two classes of people in this world, although some times it is hard to believe. The constructive element is one, and it embraces builders. That is the reason that it is hard to believe that there could possibly be any other class, because most of the people we know in our every-day life seem to be that sort of folks. They are building up their farms, their homes, their businesses and they are working hard to do these things, and seem mighty happy in their work. We do not know of an instance where Jack, or Tom or Bill, has ever tried to rip things up the back, or cut things in two, until he has made some provision to take care of the new order of things. It is true that when he builds in any line, he often makes mistakes, but instead of cussing about the bad luck of things, he goes about and rebuilds, and every time he does this he tries to build better. This seems to be natural, doesn't it? Still there are many of the other folks it seems, too, who are not contented unless they are ripping, and tearing, and cutting things up the back. Nothing is exactly right, and they seem think that they have been appointed by some one to change the entire order of things, and make them over, always for the betterment of society, but always according to their liking, regardless of the cost. If they were not naturally destructive by nature we might believe that they would do things, but how can they build any thing that will last, if they continually tear things up? Then, again, we do not like these rippers because always in their ranks are found the fault finder, the pessimist, the cynic, the hypocrite, the backbiter, the gossip, the talebearer and the knocker. They are incapable of seeing the least good in any person, and consequently possess but little good in themselves. When ever you run into a bunch of these "Destructives" keep your eye on them and their remedies. Let them howl and wail until the cows come home, about reforms, and a new order of things, but be sure, very sure, they are right before you join them.

PETITION PROSECUTOR

Members of W. C. T. U. Want State Laws Strictly Enforced.

A committee from the Charlevoix Women's Christian Temperance Union called upon prosecuting Attorney Lewis last week and presented a petition signed by eighty-eight women, the officers and members of the W. C. T. U. The petition urged the enforcement of the state laws prohibiting the selling or giving of cigars to minors and forbidding minors or school boys in pool rooms.

The prosecuting attorney assured the committee that the petition would be placed on file and that he would give the citizens the fullest co-operation in the enforcement of these laws.

Grange Column

Charlevoix Grange

Charlevoix Grange met at the home of Sister Mary Crandall Friday night, December 10. Grange opened in form in the fourth degree, with Worthy Master Dutton in the chair. It was decided to hold a joint installation of officers with Marion Center Grange New Year's Day. Then followed the election of officers:

Master—Mrs. Ella Usher.
Overseer—G. E. Dutton.
Lecturer—Martha Dutton.
Steward—A. J. Usher.
Assistant Steward—E. B. Ward.
Chaplain—Henry Black.
Treasurer—O. D. Hammond.
Secretary—Jennie Black.
Pomona—Katherine Himebaugh.
Ceres—Miladi Volter.
L. A. Steward—Mary Crandall.
Gatekeeper—R. S. Shapton.

Brother and Sister Dutton had charge of the program, which consisted of music and several guessing contests.

Sister Crandall surprised the members by serving a fine lunch in connection with the home-made candy.

Brother and Sister Burns invited the grange to meet with them next time. Owing to the regular meeting date coming on Christmas Eve, the next meeting will be held January 7th, 1916.

removed. I made my way to the little balcony, first having issued numerous orders and directions to the still stupefied Schmucka, chief among which was an indelible command to keep the gates locked against all comers.

Suddenly as I sat there ruminating I became acutely aware of something white on the ledge of the topmost window in the eastern tower. Even as I fixed my gaze upon it something else transpired. A cloud of soft, wavy, luxurious brown hair eclipsed the narrow white strip and hung with spreading splendor over the casement ledge plainly, indubitably to dry in the sun.

My neighbor had washed her hair! And it was really a most wonderful head of hair. I can't remember ever having seen anything like it except in the advertisements.

What a glorious, appealing, sensuous thing a crown of hair—but just then Mr. Poopendyke came to my window.

"May I interrupt you for a moment, Mr. Smart?" he inquired, as he squinted at me through his ugly bone-rimmed glasses.

"Come here, Poopendyke," I commanded in low, excited tones. He hesitated. "You won't fall off," I said sharply.

Although the window is at least nine feet high, Poopendyke stooped as he came through. He always does it, no matter how tall the door. It is a life-long habit with him. Have I mentioned that my worthy secretary is six feet four and as thin as a reed? I remember speaking of his knees. He is also a bachelor.

"It is a dreadful distance down there," he murmured, dithering himself against the wall and closing his eyes.

A pair of slim white hands at that instant suddenly readjusted the thick mass of hair and quite as casually disappeared. I failed to hear Mr. Poopendyke's remark.

"I think, sir," he proceeded, "it would be a very good idea to get some of our correspondence off our hands. A great deal of it has accumulated in the past few weeks. I wish to say that I am quite ready to attend to it when ever—"

"Time enough for letters," said I, still staring.

"First of all, we must have a ladder," I went on. "Have you seen to that?"

"A ladder?" he faltered, putting one foot back through the window in a most suggestive way.

"Oh," said I, remembering, "I haven't told you, have I? Look! Up there, in that window. Do you see that?"

"What is it, sir? A ring?"

"Bug! Great Scott, man, don't you know a woman's hair when you see it?"

"I've never—or never seen it—you might say—just like that. Is it hair?"

"It is. You do see it, don't you?"

"How did it get there?"

"Good! Now I know I'm not dreaming. Come! There's no time to be lost.

We may be able to get there before she hears us!"

I instructed old Conrad to have the tallest ladder brought to me in the courtyard at once.

"There is no such thing about the castle," he announced blandly.

"Where are your sons?" I demanded.

The old couple held up their hands in great distress.

"Herr Britton has them wearing their souls out, turning a windlass outside the gates—ah, that terrible invention of his!" groaned old Conrad. "My poor sons are faint with fatigue, mein herr. You should see them perspire and hear them pant for breath."

Happily a new idea struck me almost at once.

In a fifty half a dozen carpenters were at work constructing a substantial ladder out of scabbings, while I stood over them in serene command of the situation.

When the ladder was completed I mounted to the top and peered through the sashless window. It was quite black and repelling beyond, last night Britton and the two brothers to follow me in turn, I clambered over the wide stone sill and lowered myself gingerly to the floor.

I will not take up the time or the space to relate my experiences on this first fruitless visit to the east wing of my abiding place. Suffice to say, we got as far as the top of the stairs in the vast middle corridor after stumbling through a series of dim, damp rooms, and then found our way effectually blocked by a stout door which was not only locked and bolted, but bore a most startling edification to would-be trespassers.

Pinned to one of the panels there was a dainty bit of white note paper, with these satiric words written across its surface in a bold feminine hand:

"Please keep out. This is private property."

Most property owners no doubt would have been incensed by this calm defiance on the part of a squatter, either male or female, but not I. The very impudence of the message appealed to me. What could be more delicious than her serene courage in disposing of me with the stroke of a pen of at least two-thirds of my domicile and what more exciting than the thought of waging war against her in the effort to regain possession of it? Really it was quite glorious. Here was a happy, enchanting bit of feudalism that stirred my romantic soul to its very depths.

We returned to the courtyard and held a counsel of war. I put all of the Schmucka on the grill, but they stubbornly disclaimed all interest in or knowledge of the extraordinary occurrence of the east wing.

"We can smoke her out, sir," said Britton.

I could scarcely believe my ears. "Britton," said I severely, "you are a brute. I am surprised you forget there is an innocent babe, maybe a collection of them, over there and a dog. We shan't do anything hitherthence, Britton. Please hear that in mind. There is but one way we must storm the place. I will not be deluded to my very nose." I felt it to see it it was not a little out of point. "It is a good nose."

"It is, sir," said Britton. And Poopendyke in a perfect ecstasy of loyalty shouted, "Long live your nose, sir!"

My German vassals waved their hats perceiving that a demonstration was required without in the least knowing what it was about.

That night was very dark and tragic, swift storm clouds having raged up to cover the moon and stars. With a radiant lantern in the window behind me, I sat down with my pen and my pipe and my pencil. The storm was not far away.

I was scribbling away in serene contempt for the physical world when there came to my ears a sound that gave me a greater shock than any streak of lightning could have produced and yet left sufficient life in me to appreciate the sensation of being electrified.

A woman's voice, speaking to me out of the darkness and from some point quite near at hand.

"Neg your notion, but would you mind doing me a very slight favor?" Those were the words, uttered in a clear, sweet, perfectly confident voice, as of one who never asked for favors, but exacted them.

I looked about me, blinking, utterly bewildered. No one was to be seen. She laughed. Without really meaning to do so, I also laughed—nervously, of course.

"Can't you see me?" she asked. I looked intently at the spot from which the sound seemed to come—a perfectly solid stone block less than three feet from my right shoulder. It must have been very amusing. She laughed again. I flushed resentfully.

"Where are you?" I cried out rather tartly.

"I can see you quite plainly, and you are very ugly when you scowl, sir. Are you scowling at me?"

"I don't know," I replied truthfully, still searching for her. "Does it seem so to you?"

"Yes."

"Then I must be looking in the right direction," I cried impetuously. "You must see—Ah?"

My straining eyes had located a small, oblong blotch in the curve of the tower not more than twenty feet from where I stood, and on a direct line with my lantern. True, I could not at first see a face, but as my eyes grew a little more accustomed to the darkness, I fancied I could distinguish a shadow that might pass for one.

"I didn't know that little window was there," I cried, puzzled.

"It isn't," she said. "It is a secret loophole, and it isn't here except in times of great distress. See, I can close it!" The oblong blotch abruptly disappeared, only to reappear an instant later. I was beginning to understand. Of course it was in the beleaguered east wing! "I hope I didn't startle you a moment ago."

I resolved to be very stiff and formal about it. "May I inquire, madam, what you are doing in my house—my castle?"

"You may."

"Well," said I, feeling the point, "what are you doing here?"

"I am living here," she answered distinctly.

"So I perceive," said I, rather too distantly.

"And I have come down to ask a simple, tiny little favor of you, Mr. Smart," she resumed.

"You know my name?" I cried, surprised.

"I am reading your last book—Are you going?"

"Just a moment, please," I called out, struck by a splendid idea. Reaching inside the window, I grasped the lantern and brought its rays to bear upon the perfectly blank wall. I stared open mouthed and unbelieving.

"Good heaven! Have I been dreaming all this?" I cried aloud.

My gaze fell upon two tiny holes in the wall, exposed to view by the bright light of my lamp. They appeared to be precisely in the center of the spot so recently marked by the elusive oblong. Even as I stared at the holes a slim object that I at once recognized as a finger protruded from one of them and wiggled at me in a merry but exceedingly irritating manner.

Scoldily I restored the lantern to its place inside the window and waited for the mysterious voice to resume.

"Are you so money as all that?" I demanded when the shadowy face looked out once more. Very clever of me, I thought.

"I am considered rather good looking," she replied serenely. "Please don't do that again. It was very rude of you, Mr. Smart."

"Oh, I've seen something of you before this," I said. "You have long, beautiful brown hair—and a dog."

She was silent.

"I am sure you will pardon me if I very politely ask who you are?" I went on.

"That question takes me back to the favor. Will you be so very, very kind as to cease bothering me, Mr. Smart? It is dreadfully upsetting, don't you know, feeling that at any moment you may rush in and—"

"I like that. In my own castle too?"

"There is ample room for both of us," she said abruptly. "I shan't be here for more than a month or six weeks, and I am sure we can get along very amably under the same roof for that length of time if you'll only forget that I am here."

"I can't very well do that, madam. You see, we are making extensive repairs about the place, and you are proving to be a serious obstacle. I cannot grant your request. It will grieve me enormously if I am compelled to smoke you out, but I fear—"

"Smoke me out?"

"Perhaps with sulphur," I went on resolutely. "It is said to be very effective."

"Surely you will not do anything so horrid."

"Only as a last resort. First we shall storm the east wing. Falling in that, we shall rely on smoke. You will admit that you have no right to peep on my preserves."

"None whatever," she said rather plaintively.

"I can't remember having heard a sweeter voice than hers. Of course by this time I was thoroughly convinced that she was a lady, a cultured, high bred lady, and an American."

That plaintive note in her voice served its purpose. My firmness seemed to dissolve, even as I sought to re-enforce it by an injection of harshness into my own manner of speech.

"Then you should be willing to vacate my premises or or—here is where I began to show irresolution—or explain yourself."

"Won't you be generous?"

I cleared my throat nervously. How well they know the cracks in a man's armor!

"I am willing to be—amenable to rea—"

I am obliged to be at present you wouldn't impose such terms, Mr. Smart."

"Oh, circumspect! That puts a new light on the case. What have you been up to, madame?" I spoke very severely. She very properly ignored the banality. "If I should write you a nice, agreeable letter, explaining as much as I can, wouldn't you be satisfied?"

"I prefer to have it by word of mouth."

She seemed to be considering. "I will come to this window tomorrow night at this time and—let me know," she said reluctantly.

"Very well," said I. "We'll let it rest till then."

"And, by the way, I have something more to ask of you. Is it quite necessary to have all this pounding and hammering going on in the castle? The noise is dreadful. I don't ask it on my own account, but for the baby. You see, she's quite ill with a fever, Mr. Smart. Perhaps you've heard her crying."

"The baby?" I muttered.

"It is nothing serious, of course. The doctor was here today and he reassured me."

"A doctor here today?" I gasped.

She laughed once more. Verily, it was a gentle, high bred laugh.

"Will you please put a stop to the noise for a day or two?" she asked very prettily.

"Certainly," said I, too surprised to say anything else. "Is there anything else?"

"Nothing, thank you," she replied.

"Then good night, Mr. Smart. You are very good."

"Don't forget tomorrow!"

But the oblong aperture disappeared with a sharp click, and I found myself staring at the blank, sphinxlike wall.

(To be continued next week)

Christmas Dinner at Bracebridge Hall

THE dinner was served up in the great hall, where the squires always held his Christmas banquet. A blazing, crackling fire of logs had been heaped on to warm the spacious apartment, and the flame went sparkling and wreathing up the wide mouthed chimney.

The great picture of the crusader and his white horse had been profusely decorated with greens for the occasion, and holly and ivy had likewise been wreathed around the helmet and weapons on the opposite wall.

A sideboard was set out just under this equestrian trophy, on which was a display of plate that might have vied (at least in variety) with Belshazzar's parade of the vessels of the temple—"chalice, cups, beakers, goblets, basins and ewers"—the gorgeous utensils of good companionship that had gradually accumulated through many generations of jovial housekeepers. Before these stood the two Yule candles, beaming like two stars of the first magnitude. Other lights were distributed in branches, and the whole array glittered like a firmament of silver.

We were ushered into this banqueting scene with the sound of minstrelsy, the old harper being seated on a stool beside the fireplace and twanging his instrument with a vast deal more power than melody. Never did Christmas board display a more gaily and gracious assemblage of countenances. Those who were not handsome were at least happy, and happiness is a rare improver of your hard favored visage.

The person said grace, which was not a short familiar one, such as:

continually addressed to the Deity in these unceremonious days, but a long, courtly, well worded one of the sacred school. There was now a pause, as if something was expected, when suddenly the butler entered the hall with some degree of haste. He was attended by a servant on each side with a large wax light and bore a silver dish, on which was an enormous pig's head, decorated with rosemary, with a lemon in its mouth, which was placed with great formality at the head of the table.—Washington Irving.

"No Santa Claus!"

IF it be true, as some do say, That there's no Santa Claus, What is this spirit on the way That never seems to pause When Christmas chimes are sounding clear Upon the frosty night In spreading splendid gifts of cheer In every mortal's night?

What is this sense of glow divine That comes to you and me When watching all that happy line Of children round the tree? Whence comes this mantling atmosphere, So full of sweet release That falls upon us once a year And covers us with peace?

No Santa Claus? Oh, men of doubt, Whence comes this sorry claim? Would you so fair a spirit flout For reasons of a name? Dear Santa Claus is everywhere Where hearts are true and kind, And where there's love of man 'tis there His presence rare we find.—John Kendrick Bangs in Harper's Weekly.

No Perfect Christmas Sermon. Some one has said that there cannot be found in literature a single Christmas sermon which meets the occasion. Of course there cannot.

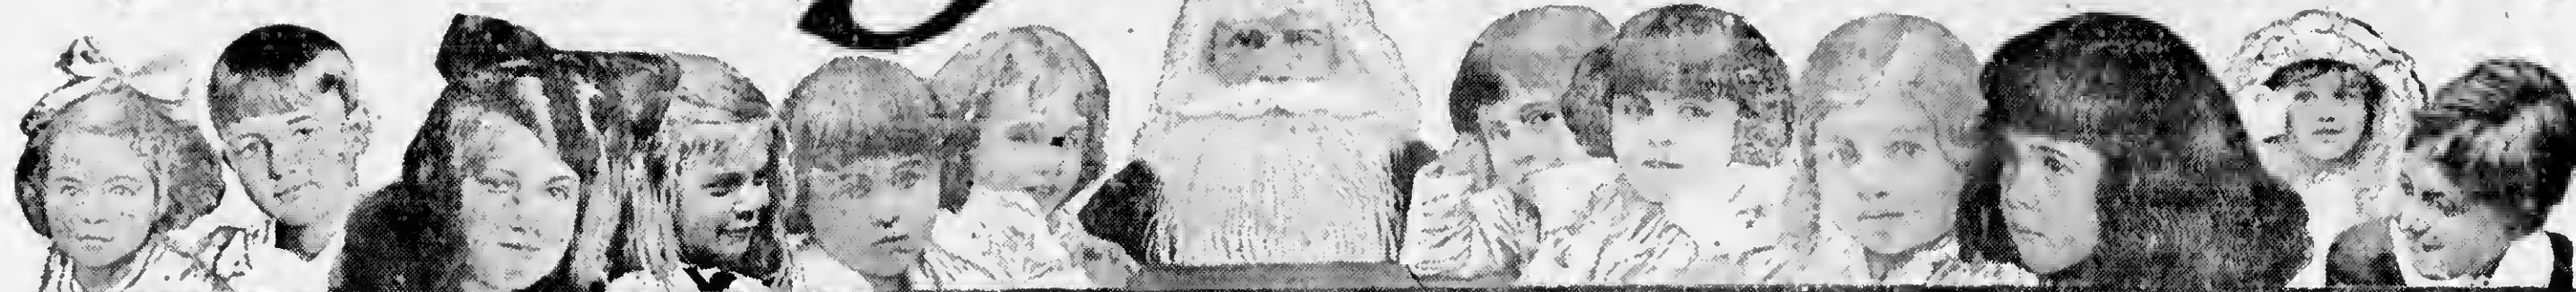

The occasion is the new birth of the world. Unless the preacher is competent to say how far the world has grown since its new birth, unless he can comprehend and declare the infinite greatness of that kingdom of God which the Saviour of men promises in the world and unless the same preacher can describe the world as it was, "the people who sat in darkness," he cannot preach the sermon which shall meet "the occasion."—Edward Everett Hale.

Reflection. What is likely to lead a person to reflection? A looking-glass.—London Telegraph.

A Christmas Church

GIVE me a snug little church, dressed for the holidays in greens, wreaths of holly, long hanging garlands of ground pine and laurel, perhaps rather awkwardly, but none the less lovingly, arranged by interested church members, not by a hired florist, and filling the building with the breath of outdoors.

I want some trees on the pulpit and high overhead a blazing star of fire, shining out into the semi-darkness of the building. I want to rise in the starlighted darkness of a properly frosty Christmas morning and in everyday clothes, wearing mittens, if I choose, and my second best hat, walk briskly through quiet streets to the church and join the waiting congregation.

There won't be a crowd. There will be no display. Only a few score of those to whom Christmas means a wonderful reality will be there. And there will be congregational singing, lots of it, and we'll run the gamut of the hymns of the Nativity. We'll read the appropriate Scripture responsively and listen to the Christmas story told once again by the kindly voice of the unpretentious clergyman. — New York Evening Post.

Turkey Not an Ancient Christmas Dish.

The turkey as a Christmas dish was introduced into England in the sixteenth century and is therefore of less antiquity than the huge sirloin of beef or the mince pie. Mince pies were first shaped like a mince, as were the Yule cakes given out by the bakers to their customers. The plum porridge later developed into the plum pudding, which dates from 1675. At the old Christmas feasts peacocks and cranes formed some of the dishes. Before being roasted the peacock was carefully skinned, and after leaving the oven the bird was reclothed with its old plumage.

Spanish Music at Christmas.

Weld music in the home is a part of the Christmas festivities in Spain. In northern Andalusia the people play the zambomba, a flowerpot perforated by a hollow reed, which is wetted and rubbed with the finger gives out a hollow, scarping, monotonous sound. In southern Andalusia the pandero or tambourine is the chief instrument.

How Not to Give

THE story is told of a woman with a great deal more money than mind and her selection of Santa Claus favors. This daughter of gold is busy twenty-four hours out of the day chasing happiness, though it is said she seldom catches up with it. Her idea of a Christmas gift is something that costs $5. Never mind what the something is so long as it represents a V. Several years ago she was particularly rushed at the holiday season, so she gave less thought than usual to the disposal of the Christmas lives. She was passing a bookshop when a limp leather and gold copy of Omar's "Rubaiyat" caught her eyes. Here was an inspiration. She would buy $5 worth of oriental pessimistic philosophy, expressed in metrical form, for a friend who lived in a hall bedroom and hadn't a second shirt waist to her name.

Upon investigation Omar looked so good she decided to mass her Christmas suggestions and spend the hundred dollars in fives she set aside for gift purposes on Khayyam and his verses. One copy went to a widowed friend of her girlhood who lived on a farm in Maine and attended the little crossroads church twice on Sunday. Omar's verses in praise of wine and love-making were well calculated to shock this recipient. Another copy was mailed to a seamstress with three young robin mouths to feed and a net lucerne of $12 a week. The elevator man in the apartment house where the munificent giver lived drew one of the limp leathers. The remainder of the recipients were more or less appropriately selected.

Picture, if you will, the widow on the farm perusing the wine, women and song philosophy of the orient; imagine the elevator man in the depths of his cage poring over "a loaf of bread, a jug of wine and thou." This year the $100 would have gone for volumes of "Moonmadness," a sort of Egyptian and Parisian nightmare, had not a safe and sane salesman persuaded the donor to select boxes of writing paper in graduated sizes. This is at least useful, and who knows but another Yuletide will find the woman sending hand picked presents to her small army of the needy?

The Chinese La-pa.

The Chinese la-pa in shape is almost identical with the ancient Roman tuba. It gives four notes—C, G, D and E.

Odd Christmas Beliefs

INDIANS say that the best time to catch a deer is on Christmas night at 12 o'clock, when they believe the deer kneels.

Some of the Germans believe that those born on Christmas day have the power of seeing spirits and even commanding them.

A popular saying in Spain for Christmas day is, "The bird of dawn singeth all night long to frighten away all evil things."

In Romania it is the custom to bless the Danube at Christmas, and a procession consisting of priests and people dressed to represent Biblical characters moves through the streets singing chants, and so to the banks of the river. The ice is broken and a small wooden cross thrown into the water. Any one who can recover the cross is regarded as extremely fortunate and sure of good luck for the remainder of the year.

Christmas celebrations in Mexico begin Dec. 17 and continue until Dec. 24. Each night a festival is held, nine in all, an invitation being sent out to these "posadas." "Posada" means "Inn," typifying the way the holy travelers, Joseph and Mary, sought in vain for rest and shelter.

Provide For Christmas.
Provide for Christmas eve that it do come to feast thy neighbor good cheer to have some.

Good bread and drink, a fire in the hall, Brawn, pudding, sauce and good mustard withal;
Beef, mutton, pork and shred pies of the best;
Pheasant, geese, capon and turkey well dressed;
Apples and nuts to throw about the hall, That boys and girls may scramble for them all.
Sing jolly carols, make the fiddlers play—Let scrupulous fanatics keep away.
For oftentimes is seen no arrant knave Than some who do counterfeit most to be grave.

Merl Jones visited school Monday afternoon.

Little Winnifred and Albert Cunningham are better at this writing.

William Williams, who has been away visiting near Wolverine, returned Wednesday.

The pupils are very busy learning their songs and recitations for the Christmas program.

The Christmas exercises will be given Friday afternoon, December 24. A cordial invitation is extended to all.

The physiology students in the fifth grade drew interesting diagrams of the human eye for one lesson this week.

Mr. and Mrs. Albert Dennis were called to East Jordan, Tuesday evening. Mr. Dennis' grandmother is very ill.

To be sure that each one would be remembered at Christmas the children wrote their names on slips of paper, which were mixed together. Then each child drew a slip. A present not exceeding the value of ten cents will be given by each one to the child whose name they draw.

Star School Notes

(Henrietta Jarnan)
The teacher and pupils are busily engaged in the rehearsal of their Xmas program.

The pupils of the eighth grade have ordered "The Birds of Killingworth" for their reading.

The Star school students are invited to attend the Christmas programme at the Mountain school.

The pupils are enjoying "The Birds of Christmas Carol" read to them by their teacher, Miss Thorne.

The pupils are much interested in current events. History period is given each Wednesday for discussion.

Your kindly interest in visiting our school and seeing the enthusiastic workers will help to set their marks a little higher.

Fifty per cent. of the pupils of Star school received certificates of award for being neither absent nor tardy in the month of September, 75 per cent. the month of October, and nearly 100 per cent. the month of November.

BURGESS

(Joseph Ostrum, Editor)

Mrs. H. S. Newson is not so well at this writing.

Our school is busy preparing for a short Christmas program.

Miss Cecile Barkley visited our school one afternoon last week.

Miss Jessie Hamlin is visiting her parents for a short time.

Miss Owen is visiting the Misses Barkley a few days this week.

Mrs. Schantz and her daughter Minnie have gone away on a short visit.

Mrs. Cunningham visited at the home of W. Armstrong Thursday evening.

Mr. and Mrs. Perl Scott have moved from the Mock farm for the winter.

Little Philo Ostrum was absent from school Friday on account of the stormy weather.

Mrs. Frank Kane and her daughter, Mrs. Trafford, visited at the home of Mrs. Ben Ostrum last Friday.

Commissioner May L. Stewart visited our school one day last week and gave us a very helpful and interesting talk.

COUNTY NORMAL.

(Florance Milner)

A number of the normal students were absent last week on account of illness.

Florence Maddaugh and Sadie Blanchard were absent Wednesday and Miss Carroll on Thursday.

Miss Blanchard assisted in the training room last Tuesday, giving some outside drill to members of the third grade.

The class are reading with interest the old but ever new, "Christmas Carol," by Dickens. This practice is one of the many ways to instill the Christmas spirit.

The normal class of 1916 may be the producers of great actresses from the result of the dramatization of "The Coming of Arthur," last week. The more interesting parts were portrayed, such as Arthur's coming, the choosing of his queen, and the establishing of the Round Table.

Sadie Donlevy was absent Wednesday morning.

Hazel Richardson was absent on Monday on account of illness.

Sunday evening the normal class and some of the high school students represented the 19 states at the W. C. T. U. meeting at the M. E. church. They sang "The Fight Is On." The class was glad to have the opportunity of helping in this program. Interesting addresses were given by the pastors of the Congregational, Methodist and Baptist churches, besides many other fine selections, which all helped to emphasize the rapid progress of the movement against the liquor traffic.

Ruth Chellis and Frances Price spent the week end at their homes in Central Lake and Bellaire, respectively.

CITIZENS PAY LAST TRIBUTE

Funeral Services of John Nicholls Held Last Saturday.

Hundreds of Neighbors Say Farewell to a Most Worthy friend and Citizen.

John Nicholls was born in Kingsbridge, Devonshire, England, June 13, 1829.

Having a desire to become a landowner and knowing that America offered advantages to young men with nerve and brawn to "blaze the trail in a new country," he with his brother, Richard, set sail from their mother country on June 28, 1850.

Three weeks later they landed in New York and made their way to Chicago, where an older brother, William, was located. Here Mr. Nicholls worked at cabinet making for a few months, until George Esterly, who had a large tract of land at Heart Prairie, Wisconsin, came to Chicago looking for men to help him harvest his large crop of grain.
Mr. Nicholls, seeing where he could take his initial step toward becoming a landowner, hired out to him and soon was taking his first lessons in farming.
From this time on these two men were the closest friends.

This led to the three Nicholls brothers taking homesteads in Trimpealean county, Wisconsin, where for a number of years they carried on farming.
Quite a part of John Nicholls' time was occupied with public affairs. For ten years he held a county office and was also a member of the state legislature. During this time, on the 15th of June, 1858, he was married in Galesville, Wisconsin, to Mary Augusta

French, who with her parents had come to Wisconsin from the State of Maine and whose ancestors were Quakers and trace to the colonial period.

To this union was born five children.
The eldest, John Jarvis, died in infancy.
The others are: Mrs. Elizabeth Mason of Fallon, Nevada; Mrs. Celia Bridge, Harry Nicholls and Mrs. Mary Paddock of this city.

In April, 1869, his wife died, leaving him with double parental responsibilities, but the strong affection for his family, which was a marked characteristic in his nature, enabled him to carry this burden as few could have done.

On July 14, 1871, he married Caroline Esterly Lewis, daughter of Geo. Esterly, widow of C. C. Lewis, Mrs. Lewis having two children by her former husband, one of whom, Mrs. Minnie E.
Meech, survives. To this union was born a son, Dr. John Nicholls, who died in New Zealand in 1910.

Mr. and Mrs. Nicholls often recalled with justifiable pride that their marriage had united their families with bonds of affection equal to blood relationship.

Soon after his second marriage he met with quite a financial disaster. His farm was set out to fruit and was then one of the best in that section of the country. A severe winter which resulted in the finish of fruit raising in that part of Wisconsin killed his trees. Mr.
Nicholls, not caring to start anew on his farm, moved his family to Whitewater, Wisconsin, where for two years he was connected with the Whitewater Manufacturing Company in the manufacture of furniture.

The death of Frank Kiser, a brother-in-law, who was managing the mill and lumbering business in Charlevoix, necessitated the company sending someone to fill his place. Mr. Nicholls came to look the ground over. His letters to his family, full of glowing descriptions of the natural surroundings, assured them that Charlevoix held for them a future.
In one of his letters he said: "To-day I stood on the place where we will build our home. It is the most beautiful spot
I ever set foot upon." It was ever thus.
Charlevoix to him was always "the beautiful."

In June, 1876, he moved his family here and in 1878 built his residence overlooking Round Lake, the doors of which were always open with great hospitality to his friends.

He had large interests in real estate and platted the towns of South Arm, East Jordan and South Boyne, East Jordan being his pet hobby. His activities extended to all matters of social and community concern. He did not come here to make money, to do business, and not to be a citizen. He gave liberally of his time and substance for the things that were to the city's best interest. He was for several years trustee of the village and also held the office of president.

Since 1880 he had been a member of the Historical Society. He was unusually studious and anything along educational lines appealed to him. He attended regularly the Episcopal and Congregational churches, but his charities sought no narrow or sectarian channels.
Realities were more important to him than names. He helped all the churches.
He wanted all to do the best they could,
and all the good they could possibly do.
In all matters benevolent and philanthropic he was appealed to, and seldom in vain.

In 1899 the Charlevoix Savings Bank, of which he was a director, urged upon him the office of president, which after re-organization was named the Charlevoix County Bank. They felt the need of his ability and integrity to put this organization on its feet. Some time previous to this the lumber business had been made a stock company and he had turned the management over to his son Harry, and stepson, F. E. Lewis. He could now give almost his entire attention to the bank, which he did for a number of years. Although he retired from the active management, he never lost interest in business affairs. This with his keen sense of humor and his interest in the social life of the town kept him always young. He enjoyed travel and had taken five trips to England, the last time when he was 81 years of age, taking his four daughters to visit the home of his boyhood. He also traveled on the continent and had seen a great deal of the United States.
In September, 1911, he suffered a bereavement in the loss of his wife.

Of his last illness it can be said that the drapery of his couch was drawn about him, and in the comforts of his home, with those near and dear administering to his wants, he laid down to peaceful sleep.

"Time though sweet is strong in flight.
And years rolled swiftly by.
When autumn leaves proclaimed at last
The old man he must die.
He laid him down quite tranquilly.
Gave up his latest sigh.
While family and friends stood round
And tears bedimmed each eye."

For he was a fine old English gentleman, one of the olden time.

The funeral was held Saturday morning at the Congregational church. The impressive Episcopal service was read by Rev. Mr. Harris, rector of the Petoskey and Charlevoix Episcopal churches. It was a coincidence that Mr.

Harris came from the same county in England from whence Mr. Nicholls came—beautiful, historic, romantic Devonshire.

The choir—composed of Drs. Allan and Frank Wilkinson, Mrs. S. A. Bush and Mrs. Allan Wilkinson—sang the chants belonging to the service and also the hymns "Lead, Kindly Light," and "Beautiful Isle of Somewhere."
Rev. C. E. Taggart, the Congregational pastor, gave the address, speaking from the appropriate text "Thou shalt come to thy grave in a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in his season."— Job v. 26.

The pall-bearers were men who had been in Mr. Nicholls' employ from 25 to 40 years. Could he have looked back upon the throng there gathered, seen the beautiful floral tributes and the genuine sorrow which lay upon every heart, he would have been pleased that he was so remembered, for, though to him honor was the opposite to outward show, the just esteem and approval of his fellow men was dear to him.

Another strong man has bowed himself; another good man has left us. His children lose a father upon whom there had been strong leaning. Neighbors say farewell to a worthy friend and citizen. Like others, this man goes to his long home, and the mourners go about the streets.

"We do not think of him as dead
Who walks with us no more.
Along the path of life we tread;
He has but gone before."

Telling Santa What They Want

Shoes Instead of Christmas Stockings

ALL over New York the children talk of the coming of Santa Claus for weeks before Dec. 25, but there was a time when he was more frequently referred to as St. Nicholas, the Dutch St. Nicholas, or San Claus. Mrs. Van Hensseler says in her "History of New York": "The stockings that our children hang on Christmas eve were once the shoes that the children of Amsterdam and New Amsterdam set in the chimney corners on the eve of Dec. 6, and the reindeer whose hoofs our children hear represent the horse, descended from Woden's horse Sleimer, upon whose back St. Nicholas still makes his round in Holland. When Catholicism prevailed St. Nicholas was everywhere the children's saint. In Holland, where his personality was modified by memory of Woden, god of the elements and the harvest, he had a peculiar hold on popular affection, which persisted into Protestant times. The children of Holland still believe that he brings the gifts that they always get on the eve of his titular day, Dec. 6."

Christmas Was For Adults Then.

Seventy years ago Christmas was an adult and a home festival. It received all its humor, all its joyousness from the ideas of father, mother and home. It was the golden ring that held all the love and sentiment we associate with those three almost divine words. Sons and daughters might stray to the very ends of the earth, but Christmas brought them home again. In the body of the child, but if not possible then in the joy of telling it to father and mother at Christmas; if it had done ill it felt sure of pardon and help at Christmas. "Father Christmas" was their own father, and by his side stood the dear, sweet mother, ever ready to persuade and plead for all her children; glad to welcome, glad to forgive, glad to punish, full of sympathy for every joyful and sorrowful condition.—Amelia E. Barr.

Mistletoe Superstitions.

What superstitions cluster, thick as its berries, round the mistletoe! In old times such were its magic powers that it was worn as an amulet, and potent love potions were brewed from it. It cured wounds, enabled any who held it not only to see ghosts, but to compel them to speak. And that a magic is not all lost will be proved this Christmas tide in thousands of our homes, where its white berries lend sanction to the osculatory homage paid to pretty faces.

POVERTY.

Poverty, my dear friend, is so great an evil and pregnant with so much temptation and so much misery that I cannot but earnestly enjoin you to avoid it. Live on what you have; live if you can on less. Do not borrow either for vanity or pleasure. The vanity will end in shame and the pleasure in regret.—Samuel Johnson

THE LITTLE FELLER'S STOCKIN'

Oh, it's Christmas eve and moonlight and the Christmas air is chill, And the frosty Christmas holly shines and sparkles on the hill, And the Christmas sleighbells jingle and the Christmas laughter rings, As the last stray shoppers hurry, takin' home the Christmas things, And up yonder in the attic there's a little trundle bed Where there's Christmas dreams a-dancin' through a sleepy, curly head, And it's "Merry Christmas!" Mary, once ag'in for me and you, With the little feller's stockin' hangin' up beside the flue.

'TISN'T silk, that little stockin', and it isn't much for show, And the darns are pretty plenty round about the heel and toe, And its color's kinder faded, and it's sorter worn and old, But it really is surprisin' what a lot of love 'twill hold, And the little hand that hung it by the chimney there along Has a grip upon our heartstrings that is mighty firm and strong, So, old Santa, don't forget it, though it isn't fine and new, That plain little worsted stockin' hangin' up beside the flue.

AND the crops may fail and leave us with our plans all gone for smash, And the mortgage may hang heavy, and the bills use up the cash, But whenever comes the season, jest as long as we've got a dime, There'll be somethin' in that stockin'—won't there, Mary? every time, And if in amongst our sunshine there's a shower or two of rain, Why, we'll face it bravely, amilin', and we'll try not to complain, Long as Christmas comes and finds us here together, me and you, With the little feller's stockin' hangin' up beside the flue. —Joe Lincoln in Saturday Evening Post.

Yuletide Recipes.

For tasty cranberry anchovy paste, which comes in tubes, may be utilized. Season with lemon juice and spread the paste on pieces of bread that have been buttered and browned in the oven. Split two anchovies lengthwise and lay them diagonally across the cranberry, marking the point where they cross by a little pyramid of rice yolk of hard boiled egg. Petal shaped pieces of the hard boiled white of egg may be placed radiating from this center.

Crab Flakes a la Newburg.—Two tablespoonsfuls of butter, two tablespoonsfuls of water, one teaspoonful of flour, one pint of crab flakes, yolks of three eggs, one pint of boiled milk and one-half cupful of sherry are the ingredients. Place the butter in the blazer of a chafin dish and stir it as it foams. Rub the flour smooth with the water, add this and the salt and pepper, then one-half of the milk, stirring all the time and being careful that the flame is not too hot. Beat the yolks of the eggs until frothy, add the remainder of the milk and stir all into the chafin dish. When the mass is of the consistency of cream add the sherry, then the crab flakes and when thoroughly heated serve.

Our Famous Raisin Bread

is making a hit with the people of Charlevoix. Many say they never knew what real good bread was before eating the kind we make. The recipe from which this bread is made is famous throughout the country. If you have not tried a loaf, do so at once, and you will become one of our regular customers.

Rye Bread With Raisins

is a new kind with us and it is a winner too. Both the Raisin Bread and the Rye Bread with Raisins are made with the celebrated California Sun-Maid Raisins, the kind you see advertised in all the leading magazines. Remember that you get a stamp with every purchase. Thirty of them will take you to the moving picture show. Ask for them and patronize this bake shop.

THEATRICAL

The Majestic Theatre announces the Vitagraph production of Hall Caine's superb love story "The Christian" which will be produced Monday, December 27.

"The Christian" is the best story ever written by Hall Caine. It is a dramatic masterpiece even for a theater, where it was physically impossible to present many of the important scenes. These same scenes have been utilized in the picture, and the useless dialogue all eliminated, with the result "The Christian" in its picture form is nothing less than the vital points of the exceptional literary masterpiece, beautifully photographed and produced by the world's foremost motion picture concern, The Vitagraph Co. Such a story as "The Christian" assures one of an exceptional motion picture classic. The universal commendation received by "The Christian" proves value of the offering.

Miss Edith Storey assumes the difficult part made famous by Miss Viola Allen. Miss Storey gives a wonderful impersonation, so much so that she easily proves the claim to her being the most talented artiste now appearing on the screen. Mr. Earle Williams is at his best as John Storm, giving the part a powerful interpretation which has met with great praise. Miss Storey and Mr. Williams are supported by an all star cast of Vitagraph players.

The Majestic has booked a five-act photoplay of exceptional interest for Wednesday evening, December 22. "Hearts and Flowers" is a play which should be a lesson to every young man today. It shows how a young man neglected his mother after obtaining practically all the money she had, and later suffered greatly from poverty and privation. The young man and his mother was later brought together, by his sweetheart. See the play at the Majestic Wednesday evening, December 22.

Yuletide Culprits in "Ye Olden Time"

THE first century of colonial life saw few set times and days for pleasure. The holy days of the English church were as a stretch to the Puritan nostrils, and their public celebration was at once rigidly forbidden by the laws of New England.

New holidays were not quickly evolved, and the sober gatherings for matters of church and state for a time took their place. The hatred of "wanton bacchanalian Christmas" spent throughout England, as Cotton said, in "reveling, dicing, carding, masking, mumming, consumed in computations, in interludes, in excess of wine, in mad mirth," was the natural reaction of intelligent and thoughtful minds against the excesses of a festival which had ceased to be a Christian holiday, but was dominated by a lord of revels who did not hesitate to invade the churches in time of service by his noisy revels and sports. English churchmen long ago revolted against such Christmas observance.

Of the first pilgrim Christmas we know but little, save that it was spent, as was many a later one, in work.

By 1650 the Puritans had grown to hate Christmas more and more. It was, to use Shakespeare's words, "the bug that feared them all." The very name smacked to them of incense, stole and monkish custom. Any person who observed it as a holiday by forbearing of labor, feasting or any other way was to pay 5 shillings fine, so desirous were they to "bent down every sprout of Episcopacy."

Judge Sewall watched jealously the feeling of the people with regard to Christmas and noted with pleasure on each succeeding year the continuance of common traffic throughout the day. Such entries as this show his attitude: "Dec. 25, 1685. Carts come to town and shops open as usual. Some somewhat observe the day, but are vexed, I believe, that the body of people profane it, and blessed be God no authority yet to compel them to keep it."

When the Church of England established Christmas services in Boston a few years later we find the Judge wading, hopeless war against Governor Belcher over it and hear him praising his son for not going with other boy friends to hear the novel and attractive services. He says, "I dishearten mine from Christmas keeping and charge them to forgo it."—Alice Morse Earle.

The Christmas "Cenone."

The "Cenone," a Christmas custom of southern Italy, is also observed in Rome. It is an ancient festival of the lower classes and is held on Christmas eve. It is a fast-feast (if it may so be designated) whose object is a reunion of families in a spirit of devotion. It consists of a supper at which macaroni and fish are the principal dishes. No other is served into whose composition either meat, yolks of eggs, milk or butter enters. Because of the "Cenone" the streets are deserted and dull on Christmas eve. After midnight in some sections noisy parades appear.

Mechanical Toys Are Not New.

In all ages of the world's history children have loved toys. History records the fact that figures of animals, such as horses, goats and dogs, were found among the toys made of pottery years before the Christian era. Even the mechanical toy is not a new invention, for in ancient Greece, where moving statuary astonished or amused both rich and poor, there was scarcely an Athenian house which did not possess a mechanical toy of some sort.

Yule Log Must Be of Ash.

In Devonshire the Yule log, to be a luck bringer, must consist of a bundle of ash sticks bound around with bands of the same tree, above in number, no more and no fewer. And every time the log cracks in the flames the good host must furnish a fresh bowl of liquor to his guests.

When You Can't Sleep.

There is an old theory, which many people believe and which is certainly harmless, that sleeplessness may often be cured in the following odd way. Move your bed out into the room so that no part of bed or covers will touch the wall. Then place under each corner of the bed a piece of rubber or a rubber overshoe or set the easter in a thick glass dish. Then go to bed, making sure the covers do not touch the wall. Thus the bed and yourself will be cut off from all electric contact with floor or wall. Such absence of electric contact, it is claimed, will make you sleep better. It is said to have cured stillborn cases of insomnia.

Christmas Dreams and Christmas Eve

CHRISTMAS DREAMS.

SOME tiny elves one Christmas grew mischievous, it seems, And broke into the storeroom where old Santa keeps his dreams

And gathered up whole armfuls of dreams all bright and sweet And started forth to peddle them down the village street.

Oh, you would never, never guess how queerly these dreams sold. Why, nearly all the younger folk bought dreams of being old, And one wee chap in curls and kilt, a gentle little thing, Invested in a dream about an awful pirate king.

A maid who thought her pretty name old-fashioned and absurd

Bought dreams of names the longest and the queerest ever heard, And, strange to say, a lad who owned all sorts of costly toys Bought dreams of selling papers with the raggedest of boys.

And then a dream of summer and a barefoot boy at play Was bought up very quickly by a gentleman quite gray, And one old lady, smiling through the grief she tried to hide, Bought bright and tender visions of a little girl who died.

A ragged little beggar girl, with weary, wistful gaze, Soon chose a Cinderella dream, with jewels all ablaze. Well, it wasn't many minutes from the time they came in sight Before the dreams were all sold out and the elves had taken flight.

—St. Nicholas.

CHRISTMAS EVE.

THE snow is white On the roofs tonight, The moon looks down with her silvery smile, And the wind blows free Through bush and tree And whistles along for mile on mile.

And, oh, hark there! On the midnight air Comes the faintest tinkle of fairy bells. They are coming near, They are coming here, And their sweet sound swelling of joy foretells.

It is Santa Claus, And he cannot pause, But down the chimney he quickly slides, Each stocking fills Till it almost spills, Then gaily chuckles and off he glides.

How happy he, The saint to be Of all the girls and all the boys! He hears his praise Through the holidays As they eat their sweets and break their toys.

So still he smiles And the time beguiles Concocting schemes our hearts to cheer. He loves us all, And great and small Regret that he comes but once a year.

—William Barclay Dunham.

Grapefruit With Apricot Brandy.
Wipe grapefruit and cut in halves crosswise. With a small sharp pointed knife make a cut separating pulp from skin around entire circumference; then make cuts separating pulp from tough dividing walls. Remove tough portion in one piece by cutting with scissors at stem or blossom and close to skin. Sprinkle fruit pulp generously with sugar. Let stand ten minutes and serve very cold with one-half tablespoonful of apricot brandy to each portion and garnish with candied cherries.

HAPPENINGS In Our Live Town

Miss M. B. Keith came to Ellsworth Saturday.

County Commissioner of Schools Belding was in the village Monday.

Ralph Vanderhelde of Atwood purchased a horse from John Westrate Monday.

The Athletic Association have the Boas hall in readiness for basketball practice and are open for games with any independent teams near home.

Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Eastcott left Monday morning for Ann Arbor as delegates to the State Grange Convention and before returning expect to visit at Detroit and other points of interest in the state.

Rev. Bond of Central Lake was accompanied Sunday by Rev. Prentice of that place, and Mr. Cass, superintendent of Sunday schools. Rev. Prentice is the pastor of the Congregational church of Central Lake. He delivered a very good sermon, his subject being "The Mission of the Church." It would do the people of Ellsworth much good to hear many more sermons such as he delivered Sunday.

PICKLE CONTRACTS

Farmers Urged to Take Full Acreage Despite Past Poor Season.

John Hartt of East Jordan is in the village this week taking contracts for pickles for the 1916 season for Williams Brothers Company, represented in this village.

The farmers should bear in mind the fact that because the 1915 season was a poor one that other seasons have not been and next season is not likely to be, and should give the company their support with a good acreage for 1916. Some will tell you that the price per bushel is not up to the standard of companies in our neighboring towns, but if you will look carefully into the contract of both companies, noting the grading of pickles and such essential points, you will be convinced that the Williams Brothers Company is giving you as good a deal or better than their competitors.

For a red-hot proposition on your winter's coal see Davis at Phelps. —Adv. 5011.

If It Were Not For Santa Claus Where Would Christmas Be?

So many little two-by-four people are trying to spoil it. Because they get no pleasure out of Christmas they don't want anyone else to.

But Santa Claus has always defeated them. He always will, just as long as there is faith and fancy in the world. And when there isn't, there might as well not be any world. Every little boy and girl knows that Santa sits all the year 'round in his snug little house at the North Pole, making toys for Xmas. And when it gets close to Christmas he harnesses up his reindeer, packs the Toys in his sleigh and this year he brought them to our store. We are now showing them in full array.

EFFECTS OF ALCOHOL.

There is no experiment more striking than this. Take a person who is even a most moderate drinker of alcohol. Let that person take his pulse in a standing position, and take it in a recumbent position in ordinary every-day life, and let him do so when there is no alcohol in his body, and when there is a dose. He finds that when in health, his heart is automatically slowed when he lies down, but that under the influence of alcohol this does not occur, or is very much reduced in its character, and wholly, as we know, by the fact that this tampering with the nerves has resulted in the heart being to a certain degree emancipated from the healthy and normal discipline which it should be under, and which nature ordained that it should be under. We have therefore to regard alcohol as a paralytic or narcotic agent entirely, and if you investigate the reasons why people take it, you will find invariably that it is for paralytic action rather than for the stimulant.

The feeling of fatigue which we all experience is a very healthy symptom.
It is a little message from nature saying that we are overdoing it, and if alcohol is taken you cut off and stop that nerve message. The engineer on board a steamer who tells you that the boilers are magnificent boilers because they never give too high or too low a pressure, and when you look at the pressure gauges you find they have been tampered with so that the correct steam pressure is not shown by them, occupies the same position as a man who explains his feelings under alcohol.

I would like you to think of the body when alcohol is circulating in it as being interfered with—to use that French saying which is on the penny-in-the-slot weighing machines—
"Please don't brutalize the machine."
—Prof. W. A. Osborne, M. B., C. Ch., D. Sc.

LIQUOR TRAFFIC GOING UNDER.

The Toledo Blade calls attention to the fact that every few days there is recorded some new step in the ultimate extermination of the liquor traffic. It says: "A brewery or distillery goes out of business. A manufacturer of bar fixtures decides to manufacture something else. An industrial plant announces that testotiers will have first choice when jobs are distributed or promotions made. Railroad companies tighten the application of the rule against drinking.
The revenue from beer and whisky falls off and the secretary of the treasury looks for new sources of income.
And so, week after week and month after month, the forces against liquor increase in numbers, the territory wherein liquor selling is profitable becomes more and more restricted."

LIGHT OF MODERN SCIENCE.

Dr. T. Alexander MacNichol, in one of his addresses, says briefly: "Fifty years ago men commonly believed that alcohol was food, tonic, and stimulant; but they were excusable for ignorance, as little was known of the psychology and chemistry of the blood and tissues; the action of bacteria upon the functions and life of tissue cells was a sealed book. The invention of instruments of precision and the application of more exact methods of examination has revolutionized our attitude toward alcohol. In the light of modern science alcohol is not a food, a tonic, or a stimulant. In a word, science has rated and classified alcohol as a universal protoplasmic poison to all forms of organic life."

ONE OF OUR GREATEST NEEDS

Banks Township Should Have a Qualified High School.

Expense Would Be Very Small in Comparison to the Good Accomplished.

We are now in a stage of progression in which we try to make our lives better by making our surroundings better. Money could not and would not make progression if it was not for intellectual ability. To have intellectual ability we must have training along some line of thought. Here is the question: "Where can we get this intellectual ability?" and the answer is: "In the public schools." The old-time schools put emphasis on preparation for the professions. In those days it was a common thing for the parents to say that a boy who was dull in school would be alright for the farm. But farming is fast becoming a science, needing the most scientific and skilled ingenuity, and we can no longer look to the dunce or dotard of our schools and say we must make a farmer of him. The farmer of tomorrow must be shrewd and well educated, for farming will be as much of a profession as the ministry or law. It is the duty of the school to elevate and put farming on this scientific basis. It is being accomplished in other places; why not here? The small country school alone cannot accomplish it, for there are too many things to take up the teacher's time and she is always in a hurry. The country school only deals or feeds fundamentals. It is the high school and college that broaden out these views.

The high school is a place where fundamental ideas are developed, as in the grades the child knows it rains, but he does not know why it rains, giving an exact reason, which any high school student, especially a student of physiology, could tell you in a moment. The high school not only broadens, but it develops those reserve brain cells which must be put to test in order to be in use in later life or years.

We, the people of Banks township in the county of Antrim, have not a qualified high school within our reach and each year some thirty boys and girls go from the eighth grade never to enter school again on an intellectual basis.

Who is to blame for this grave crime of prohibiting these children from obtaining a better education? We have no one person to blame, but we must take the blame on our own shoulders, but by taking it do not let it stand as it is, but correct it. There is an old adage which reads: "Where there is a will there is a way." We now have the way, so let us as a united people put our will behind it.

The plan is this: In the village of Ellsworth the good people have erected a good schoolhouse with extra rooms. They are willing that the people of Banks township, as a whole, use this extra room for the purpose of founding a high school of twelve grades with suitable teachers to carry on the work. This may be accomplished by each of the school districts taking its share of the burden of expense toward the upkeep of the high school only, for the people of Ellsworth will keep up their own grammar school.

The expense would be small, as nothing has to be built and we have heating apparatus. The only expense would be teachers' wages, laboratory apparatus and fixtures and probably a portion of the fuel. In this way Banks township would in reality form a township unit high school which would be the delight and pleasure of all.

In all plans the expenses are to be considered, and so they have been in this one. We have found that each year there are about fifteen people from this township who attend preparatory schools, high schools or small colleges. They have to pay their tuition, their board, their traveling expenses, and in general they are to an expense of about two or three hundred dollars a year. A high school here in your own community would cut down this enormous expense and would serve better the purpose of the preparatory school, for the reason that the children are under your own supervision to a certain extent. The upkeep of a high school would not cost half of what it costs to send these people to preparatory schools, thus keeping the money in your own community.

Next we have the question: "Will these pupils attend a high school here?" Certainly they will, and many more with them, for education to them means prosperity. A high school near them would be a great inducement for them to attend and fit themselves for life's great battle. At present there are 39 eighth graders in the township, with half of these to start a high school and that many to follow each year. We should and would have a standard high school in four years time.

A high school is what we need and also what we want. Think of the future generation and then boost for the high school, for in doing so you boost for your own community. Schools are inducements to land buyers, so to raise the price of your land get good schools and your buyers will arrive. Of course you cannot sit idle. Move your ambitions.

ELECTRIC CHRISTMAS GIFTS.

Still New Enough to Have Novelty Element Dear to Americans.

Electric Christmas gifts still possess that element of novelty dear to the American heart and thus solve the problem of giving Christmas gifts that are "different." Imagine how pleased most men would be to receive an electric shaver, an electric cigar lighter instead of needles, socks and handkerchiefs "as usual."

A teakettle for grandmother, a samovar for mother's 5 o'clock teas, a chafin dish for the college girl, a disk stove for the bachelor, a dattion or sewing machine motor for the practical housewife—all these novel and useful gifts will be appreciated by the recipients.

It should not be forgotten that these electric Christmas gifts are all useful gifts. Each of these devices is designed to do some one thing better than it can be done any other way, whether it is to percolate coffee, toast bread or furnish the power for running a sewing machine.

The presence of an electric percolator on any table adds a touch of something different and something better. The electric ten samovar is rapidly becoming quite the thing for the modern tea table.

Yuletide Feast

It Took Much to Satisfy Our Seventeenth Century Ancestors

GERVASE MARKHAM, who lived and wrote in the seventeenth century, gave an account of what was a proper Christmas dinner in his time. By it the appetites of former days may be judged. He says the first course should consist of "sixteen full dishes—that is, dishes of meat that are of substance and not empty or for show—as thus, for example: First, a shield of brawn, with mustard; second, a boy'd capon; third, a boy'd piece of beef; fourth, a china of beef, roasted; fifth, a neat's tongue, roasted; sixth, a pig, roasted; seventh, chawets, baked; eighth, a goose, roasted; ninth, a swan, roasted; tenth, a turkey, roasted; the eleventh, a haunch of venison, roasted; the twelfth, a party of venison; the thirteenth, a kid with a pudding in the belly; the fourteenth, an olive pye; the fifteenth, a couple of capons; the sixteenth, a custard, or dowets. Now, to these full dishes may be added sallies, fritoses, quelque choscs and devised paste, as many dishes more, which make the full service no less than two and thirty dishes, which is as much as can conveniently stand on one table and in one mass. And after this manner you can proportion both your second and third courses, holding fullness on one-half of the dishes and show in the other, which will be both frugal in the splendour, contentment to the guest and much pleasure and delight to the beholder."

In those good old days and for many a year thereafter the eating of vast feasts was accompanied by special revels of the season, and to see that these were conducted with proper ceremony there was appointed at court in England and in many of the greater noble houses as well a "master of the revels." He was a necessary personage indeed, as may be seen from a passage in the "Household Book of the Northumberland Family:"

"My lord useth and accustomed yearly to give hym which is ordeynede to be the Master of the Revels yerly in my lordis hous in cristmas for the oversyng and orderinge of his lordschips Playes, Interludes and Dances that is playd before his lordship in his hous in the xijth dayes of Cristemas, and they to have in reward for that caus yerly xxxs."—Detroit Free Press.

"Birthdays instead of Christmas?" Perish the thought. Birthdays are birthdays and Christmas is Christmas. How, then, substitute the one for the other?

From the holy birth, a birthday to be sure, but one calling for a general and not an individual celebration. Gifts have been given. The deed were by the wise men, remember.

If one is happy he instinctively desires to give. We cannot explain why, but we know it is so. And though many may be too unhappy or too self centered there are none so poor that they cannot give, and generously, of that spirit which makes "A Merry Christmas."

If through the year one sees what one believes would be acceptable to his friend, why not buy it if it can be afforded, and instead of giving it on the birthday keep it for Christmas? There is real pleasure in all that pertains to the season, even in the shopping. Try to put the spirit of it all into all you buy. That means joining the Spigs, so far as useless giving goes, and receiving from the clerks interest and courtesy.

Gifts, large or small; cards or words, money or love—nothing matters but the spirit. The Christmas spirit.

No Santa in Germany. Santa Claus has no existence in Germany. The gifts are received from Kris Kingle, a corruption of Christ Kindeln, or the infant Christ, "from whom cometh every good and perfect gift." They are placed not upon the tree, but upon the table beneath, to signify that in bestowing upon us his bounties our Saviour has in no way diminished his own glorious beauty. In Germany the Christmas tree is never denuded in the presence of the children. It stands in the main apartment of the establishment from Christmas to New Year's eve and is then privately "borne away by the older members of the household."

Fashion Note. The dressmaker was walking across the field.

She wore a cerise gown and a magenta sunshade.

The bull hurried hurriedly in her direction.

"I guess I better cut bias," stammered the dressmaker, hesitating no longer, "to avoid a gore."—Philadelphia Ledger.

VALUE OF LIFE.

No one, I am sure, ever laid down a great tragedy without an overwhelming sense of the value of life—life as it is, life at its most pitiless and cruel, with all its iniquities, suffering, perplexity—without feeling that he would far rather have lived and had all that than not have lived at all.—G. Lowes Dickinson.

SANTA'S TIRED!

When Jane Fixes the Knickknacks

LIKE to loaf in the kitchen while Jane in her wifely way is putting the finish on knickknacks for the dinner on Christmas day. Say, tollish early 'n' mornin', when the coffee pot's sizzlin' low, an' the roosters is crowin' for daybreak—like nobody else didn't know—An' out through the white curtained window the stars is beginnin' to fade, an' the hills that was hid in darkness is at 't' comin' out o' the shade. Directly a silence settles, so plain it is mighty nigh seen, an' me an' the post stand together, gith scarcely a nibble between. For I feel unusually tender—in a glad, half sad sort o' way—While Jane is fixin' the knickknacks for the dinner on Christmas day.

A person don't never, I reckon, disremember the old folks at home. No matter how feeble he grows an' no matter just where he may roam, an' they show pretty clear at such minits, true an' brave as in days gone by, Till I push my chair in the shadders—s-hidin' the most in my eye. I see the grave face of my father as he reads by the candlestick there, an' I hear some hymn of my mother as she rocks in the hickory chair. Then the freight of falls on the ceiling with this rose o' the old time glow, an' I dream only dreams o' the future 'stid o' dreams o' the long ago. Helgh hel! What a world o' changes from the lad to the man now, gray, Watchin' Jane as she fixes knickknacks for the dinner on Christmas day!

Then my thoughts travels on an' onward from mista where the old folks be, an' I wonder if our own children is thinkin' o' Jane an' me. If they heard some organ sendin' the song, "Do They Miss Me at Home?" Through the holy Christmas mornin', through the holy Christmas gloom, If they heard their children shoutin' in pleasure beside their toys, Would they think once more o' the home-stead, where they lived when girls an' boys?

The young has the world before 'em, but fer us it lies behind—A dim, dear land o' memories, where even I keep in mind—Wet, faded pictures in the attic—broken bits o' old glass, an' Knickknacks fer the dinner on Christmas day.

—Val T. Hale.

A GOOD TEACHER

A Wish For the Holiday Season

THINE own wish wish I thee in every place. The Christmas joy, the song, the feast, the cheer; Thine be the light of love in every face.

That looks on thee to bless thy coming year.
My own wish wish I thee—what dost thou crave?
All thy dear hopes be thine, whate'er they be.
A wish fulfilled may make thee king or slave.
I wish thee wisdom's eyes wherewith to see.
Behold, she stands and waits, the youthful year!
A breeze of morning breathes about her brow;
She holds the storm and sunshine, bliss and fear.
Blossoms and fruit upon the bending boughs.
She brings thee gifts. What blessing wilt thou choose?
Life's crown of good in earth or heaven above?
The one immortal joy thou canst not lose
"Be loved! Leave all the rest and choose thou love."
—Celia Thaxter.

THE DANGER FREE TREE.

How Electricity Provides the Sparkling Cheer Without Risk of Fire.

Nearly every 26th day of December we read in the morning papers the pathetic stories of Christmas play that ends in tragedy. It is the annual toll of the Christmas tree candle. Every city has dozens of such cases each year. The candle flame sets fire to the tinsel trimmings, a curtain blazes up, and the day of festivity ends in sorrow or some member of the family is badly burned.

The little electric tree lights are decorative and pleasing to children, and they are safe and convenient. They lamps, frills, roses, dogs, birds, snow men and grotesque little figures are all strung together on fine, silk covered wire and may be readily connected to any lamp socket behind the tree.

The little lamps sparkle and glow. They are the most effective Christmas tree ornaments ever devised, and there is far more fun for the kiddies, because the lamps can burn as long as they are wanted. They do not have to be watched, and the little lamps can be used year after year. They are suitable for any festivity and add gayety to every gathering of children.

An Austrian Christmas Delicacy.
The Austrian affects at Christmas-time a delicacy known as fruchtbrod, made of raisins, currants, figs and chopped dates. This constitutes a sort of cake, baked hot.

Mrs. Mary Martin of Atwood was in town Friday.
Mrs. J. H. Elzinga went to Petoskey last Saturday.
Dr. Vardon of East Jordan was in the village Thursday.
E. Corner of Central Lake was in town Thursday last.
The lake is frozen over and there soon will be good skating.
William Watson of Central Lake was in town Friday on business.
August VanderArk and brother, Henry went to Charlevoix Saturday.
Miss Ruth Chellis returned from her school work at Charlevoix Saturday.
Joseph Gaunt and family are moving to their new farm, the old Bentley place.
Douglas Nettleton of Charlevoix was a visitor at the home of P. Wieland Saturday.
D. E. Clow & Co. are decorating their windows with everything for Christmas. Looks good, too.
John Hart of the Williams Brothers Company was in the village the latter part of last week.
E. R. Harris went to Charlevoix Saturday to attend the funeral of the late John Nicholls.
Miss Bessie Madill left for Bicknell, Indiana, Saturday for a four weeks visit with her sister, Mrs. H. H. Kiddy.
Mr. and Mrs. Huson Ruggles were at Central Lake Friday. Mr. Ruggles has not been working for a few days on account of sickness.
George Klooster and Rev. J. D. Pickart returned Thursday from Muskegon and Grand Rapids, where they had been to attend the classics of the Christian Reformed churches of this section of Michigan.
Isaac Horrenga and daughter, Mrs. Ben Boes, arrived here Thursday, followed by Ben Boes on Friday, who came with some live stock, Mr. Horrenga having made arrangements some time ago to purchase the creamery of J. H. Elzinga at this place. With the knowledge Mr. Boes has of the creamery business there hadn't ought to be much cream shipped out of this place. Go to it, Mr. Boes, the business is yours for the getting and you can get it if you hustle.

All-Aboard Chestnut Specials

A young woman reporter on a country paper was out to interview leading citizens as to their politics. "May I see the gentleman of the house?" she asked of a large woman who opened the door at one residence. "No, you can't," answered the matron decisively. "But I want to know what party he belongs to," pleaded the girl. "Well, take a good look at me," she said sternly. "I'm the party he belongs to."

A great lawyer was cross-examining a witness. "Do you happen to know," he asked, "what time it was when the wife of the defendant stepped into the taxicab in front of the National Bank?" "It was seventeen minutes past one." "Ah, it was seventeen minutes past one, eh? Now, will you please tell the jury how you happen to be so positive that it was precisely seventeen minutes past one?" "Certainly," said the witness. "The lady was wearing an ankle watch."

An Irishman was one day looking at the notice "Your King and Country Need You." A delicate-looking Englishman happened to be passing by and, thinking to have a joke at Pat's expense, started the following: Englishman—"Well, Pat, will you volunteer for the front?" Irishman—"Begob, I will if you come." Englishman—"Why do you want me with you?" Irishman—"Sure, when the Kaiser sees you he will look for peace. He'll think the British are rising from the dead."

IN THE CIRCUIT COURT

Jury Disagrees in the Case of The People versus Jack Zagorski.

Two full jury panels and part of another were exhausted before a jury could be obtained in the case of The People vs. Jack Zagorski at the opening of court last week. After being out a greater part of the afternoon and night the jury disagreed and the case will be carried over until a later date.

The case of Burt Fuday versus Alex. Gill, which was carried to circuit court from the justice court at Boyne City, was decided in favor of Mr. Fuday and he was awarded $263 with interest.

The last three days has been taken up with the case of The People vs. Glenn Smith, statutory rape. This went to the jury at noon Wednesday and the jury was still out when we went to press.

Several divorces were granted and there are still a number of cases to be tried during this term.

Sells Wild Land.

A New Invention.

Joe Wieland, living about three miles west of Ellsworth, has invented a new wagon brake. It works automatically, so that it may be used both going up hill if you wish to stop and going down to retard the speed. Same can be operated from the seat without getting down from the load and will fit any wagon or buggy.

Atwood

Whew! This feels like winter. Sympathy in trial is sympathy doubled. Try it and see.

The Atwood schools will give an Xmas program on Christmas Eve. Everybody is welcome.

Outside dealers have bought about all of the beef cattle, sheep and hogs in this vicinity.

One week from Saturday is Xmas. Willie Jolliffe wants a violin. His mother says "No."

Hazel and Edna Jolliffe will help in the Christmas musical program at Norwood. Hazel Genett has charge of the music.

Some of our people are hollering "awful high taxes." You pay as you vote. So don't try to lay the burden upon the officers. It takes cash, and lots of it, to build roads, keep up the schools, etc.

DICKINSON IN THE LIMELIGHT

Charlotte Mon a Deciding Factor in Approaching Campaign.

Carries Around With Him 60,000 or 70,000 Votes He Can Easily Swing His Way.

The central figure in the Republican gubernatorial situation is Luren Dudley Dickinson, present lieutenant governor of the state and acknowledged leader of the movement to make Michigan a prohibition state. With the fifty little bunch of 60,000 to 70,000 voters who are certain to stick with him through a campaign, he is the deciding factor in the struggle for the Republican nomination for governor.

Must anyone reputed to be wise in the ways of Republican party politics tell you that Mr. Dickinson is very much lacking in those qualities of personal magnetism and leadership considered necessary to a successful state canvass of the electorate. Likewise they will admit that a dozen or more may be or would be Republican candidates, other men who have special interest in the character of such candidates and Democratic leaders who hope to see Governor Ferris returned for a third time all and singularly are sitting up nights just now their eyes focused Charlotte way to catch the slightest move politically indicative of this same Eaton county farmer.

All of which interest comes about because there is going to be a prohibition campaign in Michigan next year simultaneous in point of time with a canvass for the governorship.

It is when they consult the returns from previous gubernatorial primaries in Michigan and consider the lessons these returns teach that the men who shudder to think of a man of Dickinson's views sitting in the governor's chair feel the cold chills coursing down their spines. In the primary of 1914 Chase Osborn won the Republican nomination with only 58,406 votes out of a total of over 200,000, five candidates being in the field. In other words, here we have a nomination for governor made by less than 30 per cent. of the voters participating in a Republican primary and only 13 per cent. of the vote cast for governor in the subsequent general election.

In the same 1914 Republican primary, with little except prohibition support, Luren D. Dickinson for lieutenant governor won the nomination with 60,410 votes cast over David E. Heineman and Edwin J. Curtis, who split more than 115,000 opposition votes between them.

After consulting with figures the anti-Dickinsons cogitate thus: "There are twelve or more prospective Republican candidates for governor now in sight. Suppose the race narrows to even five, the number participating in the last canvass. Suppose Dickinson hangs on to these same 60,000-odd dry votes that were cast for the nomination of Osborn and Dickinson in 1914. He'll win the nomination in a walk."

Whereupon the aforesaid cogitator bends his brain to consideration of the ways and means to divert the above seemingly logical flow of political events.

"Can we split up this prohibition following among many and thus make the vote of some opposition candidate sufficient?" he asks, or, again, "Can we weed out the opposition timber and center on one single man against Dickinson?"

The point is that Dickinson—even among his opponents—is distinctly among those present in spirit whenever the governorship is discussed. Prohibition is forever cropping out and whenever the issue shows, squarely etradado it sits the lieutenant governor, calmly, serenely, as always, but with just the suspicion of small showing in his rather small, shrewd Yankee eyes whenever he hears of a new entry in the gubernatorial field.

You see Mr. Dickinson isn't as yet an announced candidate for anything in 1916. He may seek a second term as lieutenant governor; he may not seek any nomination at all; and then, again, he may—but why speculate? The nub of it all is that the man from Charlotte is acknowledged to hold a reserved seat in the saddle on the prohibition horse.

He was not a specially aggressive lieutenant governor, but he won the respect of the senators and a reputation for absolute fairness among them. He appointed an anti-saloon committee, but in his other committee selections the liquor issue did not figure.

"I don't see how the question of prohibition and the governorship can be separated this year. It seems to me every candidate must meet the issue and declare his position on it," said Mr. Dickinson in a recent interview.

"Governor Ferris's policy has been to totally ignore the liquor issue during all of his two terms as governor. I do not believe a governor elected for the next two years can maintain that attitude. I don't believe he should do so in any case. I am not yet a candidate for governor; I may not be, but if I were a candidate I would feel it my duty to declare myself.

"I guess nobody is in doubt as to where I stand," he smiled. "I am in favor of elimination of the liquor traffic in Michigan."

LOCAL STORES IN HOLIDAY ATTIRE

Citizens Given Fine Opportunities To Do Their Xmas Shopping

Well Stocked Windows and Shelves Greet Shoppers in Quest of Presents.

Charlevoix stores are in gala Yuletide attire and ready for the holiday rush. Windows have been tastefully trimmed with Christmas decorations, and the wares are being prominently displayed. Although the "do your Christmas shopping early" plea has been extensively advertised from year to year, there will always be some who enjoy the excitement to purchasing their presents in the rush a few days before December 25.

If old Saint Nicholas is without the gifts in his bag to give children in response to their appealing letters, or if he is in a quandary where to select the gifts, a suggestion is offered him to take a stroll through Bridge street and search the well-stocked windows and shelves. Here he will find gifts of all sorts that would satisfy the cravings of the most exacting youngster. Tin horns, dolls, mechanical toys, trains, etc., are given a prominent place in the store windows.

Besides being able to supply the little ones with toys, the local stores have been stocked with gifts that will aid the fathers and mothers and sweethearts, too, to select suitable presents if they have not as yet determined what shall be purchased. Electrical supply stores are well stocked with electric cook stoves for the mother, boudoir lamps for the daughter and sweetheart, flashlights for the young electrician.

The clothing stores have especially pleasing display of haberdashery for the young man, and our furniture store is well supplied with big armchairs and bookcases for the fathers.

The war may have been instrumental in depleting the supply of Christmas presents elsewhere, but it is not being felt in Charlevoix.

FIFTY-THREE FRIDAYS

During Year of 1915 and Many of Them Fell on the Thirteenth

The calendar has betrayed the secret of the bad luck which so many persons have had in the year 1915—it has 53 Fridays, and some of them fell on the thirteenth of the month besides. It keeps up to the last minute too, for New Year's Eve will be a Friday.

But the New Year starts with hope, for the calendar promises 53 Saturdays, which in many walks of life means 53 paydays and 53 half holidays.

Also, being a leap year, 1916 brings 53 Sundays, an added cause for rejoicing among workers.

Special Service.

Sunday evening the Methodist choir of fifty voices will render a Christmas cantata, "The Light Eternal," by Petrie. You are cordially invited to be present.

ADOPT SAFETY FIRST PLAN

Courier Makes Logical Suggestion to Mr. Richardi.

Plan, Although Bothersome, Used to a Considerable Extent in Charlevoix.

In last week's issue of the Sentinel Henry Richardi made a feeble attempt to take a fall out of the Courier for not printing an article originating from his most fertile brain concerning the existing lighting contract between the City of Charlevoix and himself.

The article in question was received at this office late in the afternoon of November 30, too late to be put into type for the issue of the following day. In the issue of December 8 the article was given a first-page position and published in full. The following week, December 15, Mr. Richardi, accused the Courier, through the Sentinel, of using unfair and unbusinesslike methods in not allowing him space.

The only way we can account for Mr. Richardi overlooking the article in the December 8 issue of the Courier is that he undoubtedly sat in his private office at Bellaire and made an effort to read the Courier by electric light produced from power manufactured at the Bellaire plant. In our opinion this is the solution of his failing to see the article.

You had better adopt the "safety first" plan, Henry, used by Charlevoix citizens. Just lay in a stock of candles and when there is anything of importance to look up by lamplight touch off three or four, and with the aid of these and your own "juice" you will have sufficient light to make ordinary newspaper type readable.

Opening Monday Evening

Rev. L. C. Vinyard announces that the public opening of the club rooms in the Baptist church will take place Monday evening. A fine program has been prepared, in which prominent local speakers will take part. As the work is of vital interest to every citizen, every one is urged to be present. Watch for hand bills with program later in the week.

ACCIDENTALLY SHOT HIMSELF

George Banks of Hayes Township Found Dead in Vacant Building.

Terrible Gun Shot Wound in Abdomen Caused Almost Instant Death.

The dead body of George Banks of Hayes township was found Monday afternoon between four and five o'clock, in a small building used for storage purposes on the farm of Fred Gray, about a mile from his home.

Banks had ate his dinner at his home and told the members of the family he intended going to the woods to cut wood. At the time he left the house, he carried a single barrel shot gun, and told one of his children he would bring back a rabbit. This was the last time he was seen alive.

On the way to the woods the road ran through the farm of Fred Gray. About a half mile from the woods, where he intended to cut wood, is a small building used by Mr. Gray to store implements, etc. Banks entered the building and in some manner the accident occurred that caused his death.

Between four and five o'clock, Mrs. Gray and daughter noticed the door of the building open, and went there to investigate the cause. Upon looking in, they saw Banks lying on the floor, on his face. Receiving no answer as they spoke, they investigated the cause, and upon seeing the condition of things, gave the alarm to the other members of the family.

Sheriff Novak, Prosecutor Lewis and Coroner Wilkinson visited the scene of the accident about 7 o'clock in the evening. From the position of the body, Banks had evidently drawn the gun toward him, and in so doing, it was discharged, the contents striking him in the abdomen. The wound was a ghastly one, the muzzle of the gun being so close to the body that his clothing was burned. The investigation brought to light nothing of unusual nature other than accidental.

Banks was a young man and leaves a wife and children. Funeral services will be held Thursday.

Nothing will make a more suitable Christmas gift than a pair of slippers. See them at Bedford's. Adv. 511t

MOORE AGAIN IN TROUBLE

Sea Wolf Ice Bound Off Harbor Beach and Picked Up By Lighter Ketchum.

Allie Moore and wife are again brought into the lime-light through accident and misfortune on their trip by power boat from this port to Detroit.

It will be remembered that some time ago they were thought to be lost somewhere in Lake Huron off Tawas City. It was learned later that during a heavy blow their boat had been driven up a creek near Grindstone City, and when the water receded, the boat was left high and dry. However, they later managed to float the boat, and from the following article, clipped from the marine page of the Detroit Free Press, again started on their way to Detroit. Following is the article, under date of December 19, from Harbor Beach:

"The powerboat Sea Wolf, bound for Detroit with Mr. and Mrs. Allie Moore, became ice-bound off here Saturday and the couple were picked up by Captain Bolt Reid, of the lighter Ketchum, of the Reid fleet at Sarnia. The boat was placed aboard the Ketchum and will be brought to port Huron."

ANOTHER AGED RESIDENT CALLED

William Cooper Came to Charlevoix County in 1880.

Services Held From Methodist Church, Wednesday at 10:30 a. m.—Interment Brookside

William Cooper, a resident of Charlevoix for the past 36 years, died at his home, corner Grant and Clinton streets, last Saturday afternoon at 3:45, after an extended illness, the direct cause being heart disease caused by years of suffering from asthma.

Deceased was born in England, October 14, 1832. At the age of three years he was removed to Canada with his parents, where he lived until during the Civil war, when he removed to Washenaw county, this state. He resided here for twelve years, then moved to Kent county.

In 1880, after his marriage, he came to Charlevoix county and settled on a farm just south of the cemetery, now occupied by James Wyers. He lived here until 1907, when he moved to Charlevoix, where he resided until the time of his death. During the early days it is said that he owned the second team of horses every brought to this part of the country. He was identified with the early history of this community in various ways, and held the highest respect of the entire community.

He is survived by six children, three sons and three daughters, Oliver, Will H., Mrs. A. Beeman and Minnie, who reside here, and James of Big Rapids and Mrs. Fessenden of Boons, Michigan, all of whom were present at the funeral. The aged wife and mother died some eight years ago.

Funeral services were held from the Methodist church Wednesday, at 10:30 a. m., Rev. Quinton Walker, officiating. Interment at Brookside cemetery.

FINE XMAS NUMBERS

Griati County Herald and See News Break All former Records.

Regardless of the supposition that a general depression of business exists throughout the state, many of the leading daily and weekly newspapers have produced the finest and largest Christmas numbers this year of previous years. Those who deserve special are:

The Sault Ste. Marie News Christmas number contains 62 pages well filled with advertising and specially prepared reading matter. The edition is a credit to the publishers.

The Gratiot County Herald, Michigan's largest weekly paper, breaks all former records this year. The Christmas number contains 40 pages, a fine run of advertising, and the paper eclipses all former attempts in the weekly newspaper field.

The East Jordan Herald increased to 12 pages with a fine cover, as did also the Antrim County News.

The Alma Record and Mt. Pleasant Times also produced excellent 20 page Christmas numbers, which are a credit to the community.

TO BETTER EQUIP BOYS AND GIRLS

Should Be the Business of Every School in Michigan.

Escanaba Editor Takes a Fall Out of Governor Ferris on Stand He Has Taken.

Governor Ferris is reported to have recently denounced the teaching of domestic science in the high schools of this state. He thinks "it is depriving the mothers of the right to teach their daughters to sew and cook and run a home." The governor's objection will not commend itself to those who have seen the practical benefits that come from the teaching of domestic science in high schools.

The business of schools is to better equip boys and girls to assume the obligations of manhood and womanhood. Woman's true sphere is the home. God intends her to be the home builder, and the better home builder she is the better the world will be. Theoretically the girl should learn all about domestic science in the home, but the kind of home building many of the girls of the present day learn in the home is what is preventing many a loving young woman from popping the question to some young man.

If girls knew more about making bread and less about keeping hooks; more about making their own gowns and less about selling the ready-made gowns in the stores; more about the proper way of taking care of babies and less about taking care of typewriters; more about making one dollar do the work that two dollars is doing in the average home these days than she does about chasing after some foolish fellow who is willing to spend all the money he can earn in giving her a good time—then, indeed, would the happy time be approaching when we would have more happy homes and the pathway to the divorce courts would become grass-grown.

The girl most to be admired and the one who will be the most sought after by young men whose attentions are worth while is she who learns the true womanly art of being more charming in the home than she is in the ballroom; in short, she whose charms are those of the heart and mind instead of the mere physical charms of face, form and dress.

Efficient wives and home builders are the antidote for unhappy homes and careworn, discouraged husbands. Let us have domestic science in the schools, and more of it.—Escanaba Journal.

HUDKINS POSTMASTER

Well Known Wilson Township Resident Receives East Jordan Appointment.

Word was received Friday from Washington that Chas. H. Hudkins of Wilson township had been appointed postmaster of the East Jordan office.

Postmaster Potter's four year term expired Monday, the 20th, and for the past few months there had been a merry contest on between the local Democrat aspirants.

Mr. Hudkins has been a lifelong Democrat and has served his township as supervisor for a number of years.

Mr. Potter has several business ventures in view, but will undoubtedly remain with Mr. Hudkins for several weeks to give the incoming postmaster a line on the work.—East Jordan Herald.

DO IT NOW

Charlevoix People Should Not Wait Until It Is Too Late.

The appalling death-rate from kidney disease is due largely to the fact that the little kidney troubles are usually neglected until they become serious. The slight symptoms often give place to chronic disorders and the sufferer may slip gradually into some serious form of kidney complaint.

If you suffer from backache, headaches, dizzy spells; if the kidney secretions are irregular of passage and unnatural in appearance, do not delay. Help the kidneys at once.

Doan's Kidney Pills are especially for kidney disorders—they act where others fail. Over one hundred thousand people have recommended them. Here's a case at home:

Mrs. John Hull, 102 W. Lincoln Ave., Charlevoix, says: "About a year ago I had a severe attack of lumbago. I suffered greatly and tried many remedies, but got no relief until I took Doan's Kidney Pills, procured at the Ivy Drug Store. Later I was again having trouble from weak kidneys and backache. I again took Doan's Kidney Pills and they acted promptly in bringing relief."

Price 50c, at all dealers. Don't simply ask for a kidney remedy—get Doan's Kidney Pills—the same that Mrs. Hull had. Foster-Milburn Co., Props., Buffalo, N. Y.

School Commissioner's Notes

A Merry Christmas to you!

Every school has now been visited once; a few have been visited two or three times to date.

The commissioner was visiting schools in Hayes and Bay last week and was overjoyed to find that in this part of the county the old Baldwin readers were almost entirely a part of the dead past, the Redway and Hinman geographies were fast disappearing and the Milner arithmetics were dying a slow but natural death. The uniform texts of the directory were truly most prominent.

School officers' meeting January 6th. See notice in another column of this paper.

The president of the Marquette normal, President Kaas, will conduct the teachers' institute in February. Supt. Tyler of Traverse City has consented to be present.

Boys' City reading circle organized December 18th in the English room of central building. Prospects look bright for a large attendance.

The old year is almost spent. A happy new year to you.

Christmas programs everywhere, Christmas trees, Christmas spirit, Christmas giving, Christmas living! Got the germ? Its a splendid contagion!

Maple Grove has two rows of splendid adjustable seats and some of the best-chosen pictures in the county—a real live school and possibly a good Standard prospect.

The teachers of the Afton school gave out 27 monthly certificates of award for November. Afton is figuring on the more light proposition. The state inspector advised a solid wall of light to the left. With these people the question is not "Shall we do this?" but "When shall we do this?"

Walloon, Burgess and Hopyard schools are competing with splendid attendance records during the past month. Clarion is close in the race.

The Knop school has organized a sewing class.

The Pleasant Valley girls have organized a "Hard Work Circle."

Rock Elm standard school workers have submitted their plans to the state department for approval. The electors mean business in this district.

During this season of the year a number of autumn skin diseases are quite prevalent. All school boards will do well to provide sanitary paper towels for their schools.

The Gill school, out from Clarion, is equipped with a new teacher's desk and revolving chair. Some more social money wisely spent.

Three Bells will be ready for their "Standard Plate" early in the new year. A case where it pays to "dig down."

One of the most important things to keep in mind when you are contemplating having an Auction Sale is to engage an Auctioneer who is on the job every minute and knows how to conduct a sale.

It is My Business

Experience has taught me how to conduct a sale successfully. Have cried over 500 in the last 10 years and make it a point to always give satisfaction.

When you are ready for that sale, write me at Charlevoix, or book any date you want at the Courier Office.

SYNOPSIS.

John Bellamy Smart, unmarried and heir to a fortune, while abroad with his secretary, Poopendyke, and his valet, Britton, buys a dilapidated old castle on the Danube, in care of the Schmicks, and discovers a mysterious woman inhabiting one of the towers.

Smart fails to batter down a huge door leading to the east wing in search of the fair lady. He interrupts a visit of American relic hunters.

Their anxious attempts to buy some of the castle's ancient furniture result in their discovery and hurried departure. Smart catches a glimpse of his fair neighbor's waving hair.

Another visit to the mysterious east wing fails, but later the beautiful stranger strikes up an acquaintance with the new owner through a secret luncheon.

CHAPTER V.

I Become an Ancestor.

TRUE to the promise she had extracted from me, I laid off my workmen the next morning. They trooped in bright and early, considerably augmented by fresh recruits, who came to share the benefits of my innocuous prodigality, and if I live to be a thousand I shall never again experience such a noisome half hour as the one I spent in listening to their indignant protests against my tyrannical oppression of the poor and needy. In the end I agreed to pay them, one and all, for a full day's work, and they went away mollified, calling me a true gentleman to my face and heaven knows what to my back.

Practically at 9 o'clock that evening I was in the balcony, thinking my lucky stars that it was a bright moonlit night. There was every reason to rejoice in the prospect of seeing her face clearly when she appeared at her secret little window. But she wore a white, filmy veil, I naturally concluded that she was homely.

"Good evening," she said on opening the window.

"Good evening," said I, contriving to conceal my disappointment. "How is the baby?"

"Very much better, thank you. It was so good of you to stop the workmen."

"Won't you take off your veil and stay awhile?" I asked, politely face-thing. "It is not quite fair to me, you know."

Her next remark brought a blush of confusion to my cheek. A silly notion had induced me to dim my full evening regalia, spiketail coat and all. Nothing could have been more indelicately incongruous than my appearance, I am sure, and I never felt more uncomfortable in my life.

"How very nice you look in your new suit," she said, and I was aware of a muffled quality in her ordinarily clear, musical voice. She was laughing at me. "Are you giving a dinner party?"

"I usually dress for dinner," I lied with some bashfulness. "And so does Poopendyke," I added as an afterthought. My blush deepened as I recalled the attenuated blazer in which my secretary breakfasted, lunched and dined without discrimination.

"For Gretel's benefit, I presume."

"Ah! You do know Gretel, then?"

"Oh, I've known her for years. Isn't she a quaint old dear?"

"I shall discharge her in the morning," said I severely. "She is a liar, and her husband is a poltroon. They positively deny your existence in any shape or form."

"They won't pay any attention to you," said she, with a laugh. "They are fixtured, quite as much so as the walls themselves. You'll not be able to discharge them. My grandfather tried it fifty years ago and failed. After that he made it a point to die unless Conrad every day in the year and Gretel every other day. As well try to remove the mountain, Mr. Smart. They know you can't get on without them."

"I have discharged her as a cook," I said triumphantly. "A new one will be here by the end of the week."

"Oh," she sighed plaintively, "how glad I am! She is an atrocious cook. I don't like to complain, Mr. Smart, but really it is getting so that I can't eat anything she sends up. It is jolly of you to get in a new one. Now we shall be very happy."

"By Jove!" said I, completely staggered by these revelations.

"I have thought it over, Mr. Smart. She went on in a businesslike manner, and I believe we will get along much better together if we stay apart."

Ambiguous remarks ordinarily reach my intelligence, but I was so stunned by preceding admissions that I could only gasp.

"Do you mean to say you've been subsisting all this time on my food?"

CHAPTER VI.

"Who is this woman?"

ONRAD and Gretel appeared with Britton after an unconscionable lapse of time, partially dressed and grumbling.

"Conrad," said I, fixing the ancient

"I am a very old man," he whined.

with a stern, compelling gaze, "this has gone quite far enough."

"Yes, mein herr?"

"Do you serve me, or do you serve the lady in the east wing?"

"I do," said he, with a great deal more wit than I thought he possessed.

"I have been talking with the lady this evening," said I.

"Yes, mein herr; I know," said he.

"Oh, you do, eh? Well, will you be good enough to tell me what is the meaning of all this two faced, underhand conduct on your part? I want the truth from you. Who is this woman, and why are you so infernally set upon shielding her? What crime has she committed? Tell me at once, or by the Lord Harry, out you go tomorrow—all of you!"

"I am a very old man," he whined, twisting his gnarled fingers, a suggestion of tears in his voice. "My wife is old, mein herr. You would not be cruel. We have been here for sixty years. The old baron—"

"Enough!" I cried resolutely. "Out with it, man! I mean all that I say!"

"Tomorrow, mein herr, tomorrow," he mumbled in a final plea. I shook my head. "She will explain every thing tomorrow," he went on eagerly.

"I am sworn to reveal nothing, mein herr. My wife, too, and my sons. We may not speak until she gives the word. Alas, we shall be turned out to die in our!"

"We have been faithful servants to the Isthmohofens for sixty years!" sobbed his wife.

"And still are, I suspect!" I cried angrily.

Mr. Poopendyke's common sense came in very handy at this critical juncture. He consoled me to let the matter rest until the next morning when it was reasonable to expect the lady herself would explain everything.

However, we forced something out of Schmick before his stalwart sons came tramping up the stairs to rescue him. The old man gave us a tough of instead of the other way around."

"Tight!" said I, considerably dashed. "Besides, sir, would it not be safer to wait till the tourist party has come and gone?"

"No tourists enter this place tomorrow or any other day," I declared firmly.

"Well, I'd suggest waiting just the same, sir," said he, evidently inspired.

"Confound them!" I growled, some how absorbing his presentiment.

He hesitated for a moment near the door.

"Will you put in the telephone, sir?" he asked respectfully.

Very curiously I was thinking of it at that instant.

"It really wouldn't be a bad idea, Britton," I said, startled into committing myself. "Save us a great deal of legging it over town and all that sort of thing, eh?"

"Yes, sir. What I was about to suggest, sir, is that while we're about it we might as well have a system of electric bells put in—that is to say, sir, in both wings of the castle. Very convenient, sir, you see, for all parties concerned."

"I see," said I, impressed, and then repeated it, a little more impressed after reflection. "I see. You are a very resourceful fellow, Britton. I am inclined to hound all of the Schmicks. They have known about this from the start and have lied like thieves. By Jove, she must have an extraordinary power over them or claim or something equally potent. Now I think of it, she mentioned a grandfather. That would go to prove she's related in some way to some one, wouldn't it?"

"I should consider it to be more than likely, sir," said Britton, with a perfectly straight face. He must have been sorely tried in the face of my insane maunderings. "Pardon me, sir, but wouldn't it be a doped idea to have it put with the Schmicks tonight?"

"Excellent idea, Britton. We'll have them up in my study."

EVERYBODY thinks he can run a newspaper better than the beknighted souls who have been placed by providence in that unenviable position. Maybe it is because the editor's faults are glaring ones—out in the open in black and white—or, possibly, it is just a queer quirk of human nature and the job's so easy anyway.

Running the paper is sort of a side line with lots of people. They offer advice in their spare moments with the same spirit as they play pinochle or golf. One would have the editor a militant suffragist, another demands that he rail against women voting.
The prohibitionists can't see how any decent person can be for the regulated saloons and accuse him of selling out to the liquor interests if he takes that side, while the wets say he is being intimidated by the church and ruled by the drys if he is opposed to the saloon.

The Democrats say the paper is a "dirty rag" if the editor is Republican in his sympathies, and the Republicans stop their subscriptions if he comes out for a Democrat. If the editor is for anything the antis condemn him, and vice versa. If he takes a stand he is trying to dictate to the community.
If he doesn't take a stand he is a mollycoddle and a jellyfish. He is a crank, a reformer, a fanatic, a crook, a fourflusher, a disturber of the peace, or just a plain idiot, according as he meets with the desires of his subscribers or goes against them. And there you are.

The average man never thinks of the hours of toil—downright, soul-sweating toil—it takes to get out a paper. He never thinks of the worries, the trials, the tribulations every editor must undergo. Some of them are so unappreciative of his efforts to boost their town and make money for them that they will not even contribute the price of a subscription. Just remember this: The editor, apart from the perfectly laudable desire to make a decent living for himself and his family, has only the good of the community at heart. If he disagrees with you on any subject—political, moral or educational—you and not he may be wrong.

THE Republican party will come back into power in 1916 not because political leaders want it to win, but because the rank and file of the American people are convinced that Republican principles and administration are best for the industrial welfare and public service of the country. It will be a victory of the people and not a victory of the leaders.

HENRY Ford drew up his will before he left to atop the war. Henry realizes that the path of the peacemaker is not always a path of peace.

No wonder T. R. and "Billy" Sunday denounce the Ford trip so bitterly, as it has crowded them off the front page among the liver pill ads.

We can stand almost any kind of man, but the fellow who gives you a hand like a limp fish to shake isn't one ja it that you want more wages?"

"Naw'm, 'tain't dat neither." "Are you sick?" "Naw'm, I ain't sick, but I'll tell you a fac'. You recollect' you let me get off to a funeral 'but a mont' back? Well'm Christmas morn I've gwine to marry de corpse's husban'."

A small, henpecked, worried-looking man was about to take an examination for life-insurance. "You don't disap-ate do you?" asked the physician, as he made ready for tests. "Not a fast liver, or anything of that sort?" The little man hesitated a moment, looked a bit frightened then replied, in a small, piping voice: "I sometimes chew a little gum."

A Swedish farmer, who lived on his wheat farm in Minnesota, was taken ill and his wife telephoned the doctor.
"If you have a thermometer," answered the physician, "take his temperature.
I'll be out and see him presently."
"How is he?" asked the doctor. "Well," said she, "Ae ban put the barometer over the bank at the rear of Mrs. O. A.

Sears' residence on Park avenue last Friday. Eddie O'Neill, the driver, was answering a call and when making the turn at the corner of Park avenue and Grant street, the car started to slide, and went over the embankment, lodging against a tree when nearly to the bottom of the steep bank. O'Neill jumped as the car slid across the walk.
The top and body of the car were injured somewhat, but when pulled out was able to make the barn under its own power. It was a Ford.

Inside history concerning Schloss Rothboefen and its erstwhile powerful barons.

About the middle of the nineteenth century the last of the real barons—the powerful, landowning, despotic barons, I mean—came to the end of his fonscore years and ten and was laid away with great pomp and glee by the people of the town across the river. He was the last of the Rothboefens, for he left no male heir. His two daughters had married Austrian noblemen, and neither of them had a male descendant. The estate, already in a state of financial as well as physical disintegration, fell into the hands of women and went from bad to worse so rapidly that long before the last quarter of the century was fairly begun the castle and the reduced holdings slipped away from the Rothboefens altogether and into the control of the father of the count from whom I purchased the property. The count's father, it appears, was a distiller of great wealth in his day and a man of action. Unfortunately he died before he had the chance to carry out his projects in connection with the rehabilitation of Schloss Rothboefen, even then a deserted, ramshackle resort for paying tourists and a Mecca for antique and picture dealers.

The new count, my immediate predecessor, was not long in dissipating the great fortune left by his father, the worthy distiller. He had run through with the bulk of his patrimony by the time he was twenty-five and was pretty much run down at the heel when he married in the hope of recouping his lost fortune.

The Schmicks did not like him. They did not approve of him as lord and master, nor was it possible for them to resign themselves to the fate that had put this young scoundrel into the shoes, so to speak, of the grim old barons Rothboefen, who, whatever else they may have been in a high hinded way, were men to the core. This pretender, this creature without brains or blood, this sponging reprobate, was not to their liking. If I am to quote Conrad, who became quite forceful in his harangue against the recent order of things.

Ho, his wife and his sons, he assured me, were full of respect when they learned that the castle had passed from Count Hohendahl's hands into mine. I at least would pay them their wages, and I might, in a pinch, be depended upon to pension them when they got too old to be of any use about the castle.

All attempts on my part to connect the lady in the east wing with the history of the extinct Rothboefens were futile. He would not commit himself.

"Well," said I, yawning in helpless collusion with the sleepy Gretel, "we'll let it go over till morning. Call me at 7, Britton."

I went to bed, but not to sleep. It was very clear to me that my neighbor was a disturber in every sense of the word. She wouldn't let me sleep for hours I tried to get rid of her, but she flitted into my brain and prodded my thoughts into the most violent activity. She wouldn't stay put. But finally I dropped off.

I was aroused from my belated sleep by the sound of mighty canteers and the tread of countless elephants. Too late I realized that the tourists were upon me! Too late I remembered that the door to my room had been left unlocked! One hundred and sixty-nine were huddled outside my door, drinking in the maddening drive of the guide who had a shrill, penetrating voice and not the faintest notion of a conscience.

I listened in dismay for a moment and then, actuated by something more than mere fury, leaped out of bed and prepared for a dash across the room to lock the door. On the third stride I whirled and made a flying leap into the bed, snuffling beneath the covers with the speed and accuracy of a eel. Just in time, too, for the heavy door swung slowly open a second later and the shrill, expiatory voice was projected loudly into my lofty bed chamber.

"Come a little closer, please," said the morose man with the cup. "This room was occupied for centuries by the masters of Schloss Rothboefen. It is a bedchamber. See the great round bed. It has not been slept in for about with me, and it dropped with a sudden inconvulsion upon my toes. In moments of gravity I am always doing something like that. The pain was terrible, but I finished at the fortune house that she might at least smile over my agony."

"I beg your pardon," I began, and then discovered that I was not wearing a cap. It was most disconcerting.

"So you would come," she said very coldly and very levelly.

"It was necessary, madame," I replied as best I could. "You defied me I think you should have appreciated my position, my motives—er—my—"

She silenced me—tactfully, heaven knows—with a curt exclamation. "Your position! It is intensely Napoleonic," said she, with fine irony. Her gaze swept my horde of panting, wide-eyed house-breakers. "What a noble victory!"

It was quite time far me to assert myself. Bowing very stiffly, I remarked:

"I regret exceedingly to have been forced to devastate my own property in such a trifling enterprise, madame. The physical loss is apparent—you can see that for yourself—but, of course, you have no means of estimating the mental destruction that has been going on for days and days. You have been hacking away at my poor, distracted brain so persistently that it really had to give way, in a measure. This should account for my present lapse of sanity. Weak-mindedness is not a crime, but an affliction."

She did not smile.

"Well, now that you are here, Mr. Smart, may I be so bold as to inquire what you are going to do about it?" I reflected. "I think, if you don't mind, I'll come in and sit down. That was a den of a rap I got across the toes. I am sure to be a great deal more lenient and agreeable if I'm asked to come in and see you. Incidentally I thought I'd step up to inquire how your headache is getting on. Better, I hope."

She turned her face away. I suspected a smile.

"If you choose to bang your old castle to pieces in order to satisfy a masculine curiosity, Mr. Smart, I have nothing more to say," she said, feeling me again—still ominously, to my despair. Confound it all, she was such a calm, helpless little thing—and all alone against a mob of burly ruffians!

"Will you be good enough to send your army away, or do you prefer to have it on hand in case I should take it into my head to attack you?"

"Take 'em away, Mr. Poopendyke," I commanded hurriedly. As they crowded down the short, narrow stairway I remarked old Conrad and his two sons standing over against the wall, three very sinister figures.

"I see, madame, that you do not dismiss your army," I said, blandly sarcastic.

"Oh, you dear old Conrad!" she cried, catching sight of the hitherto submerged Schmicks. The three of them bobbed and scraped and grinned from ear to ear. There could be no mistaking the intensity of their joy. "Don't look so sad, Conrad. I know you are blemeless. You poor old dear!"

I have never seen any one who looked less sad than Conrad Schmick. I rather preposterously ordered him below.

"I will attend to you presently—all of you," said I. They did not move. "Do you hear me?" I snapped angrily. They looked stolidly at the slim young lady.

She smiled, rather proudly, I thought. "You may go, Conrad. I shall not need you. Max, will you fetch up another scuttle of coal?"

They took their orders from her!

"By Jove!" I said, looking after my trusty men servants as they descended. "I like this! Are they my servants or yours?"

"Oh, I suppose they are yours, Mr. Smart," she said carelessly. "Will you come in now and make yourself quite at home?"

"Perhaps I'd better wait for a day

"I sat bolt upright and yelled, 'Get out!'"

"Or two," said I, yawning. "Your headache, you know. I can wait just as well as—"

"Oh, oo! Since you've come to all the trouble I suppose you ought to have something for your pains."

"Pains?" I murmured, and I declare to heaven I blushed as I followed her through the door into a tiny hall.

"You are a most unreasonable man," she said, throwing open a small door at the end of the hall. "I am terribly disappointed in you. You looked to be so nice and sensible and amiable."

"Oh, I'm not such a nincompoop as you might suspect, madame," said I testily, far from complimented.

"And now, Mr. Smart, will you be kind enough to explain this incomprehensible proceeding on your part?" she said, facing me sternly.

But I was dumb. I stood just inside the door of the most remarkable apartment it has ever been my good fortune to look upon. My senses reeled

Was I awake? Was this a part of the bleak, sinister, weather-racked castle in which I was striving so hard to find a comfortable corner?

"By the Lord Henry!" I began, fading my tongue only to lose it again.

The room was completely furnished, bedecked and rendered habitable by a hundred and one articles that were mysteriously missing from my side of the castle. Rugs, tapestries, curtains of the rarest quality; chairs, couches and cushions; tables, cabinets and chests that would have caused the eyes of the most conservative collector of antiques to bulge with—no wonder, but greed; statues, pedestals, bronzes, bronzes, porcelains—but why enumerate? On the massive oaken center table stood the priceless silver vase we had missed on the second day of our more than 200 years. The later barons refused to sleep in it because one of their ancestors had been assassinated between its sheets at the tender age of six. He was stabbed by a stepuncle who played him false.

A resolute beholder spoke up, "Can't we step inside?"

"If you choose, madame. But we must wait a time."

"I do not want to see where the old barons slept."

"Please do not handle the bedspread and curtains. They will fall to pieces!"—I heard no more, for the rearguard had pushed him aside and was swooping down upon me. A sharp nose man led the way. He was within three feet of the bed and was stretching out his hand to touch the proscenium fabrics when I sat bolt upright and yelled:

"Get out!"

Afterward I was told that the guide was the first to reach the bottom of the stairs and that he narrowly escaped death in the avalanche of horrified humanity that piled after him, pursued by the pulsant ghost of a six-year-old ancestor.

MODERATION.

In work or play never overdo. Balzac said: "By two instinctive processes man exhausts the springs of life within him. Two verbs cover all the forms which these two causes may take—to will and in have your will." If you will to do too much in any line you exhaust the springs of life. To keep health, to keep young as long as possible, strive in work and in play, in eating and thinking, to preserve the golden mean.

Grateful Mothers Tell Experiences

Mrs. T. Neureuer, Eau Claire, Wis., writes: "Poley's Honey and Tar Compound cured my boy of a very severe attack of croup after other remedies had failed. Our milkman turned his children of whooping cough. I recommend it to every one, as we know from our own experience that it is a wonderful remedy for coughs, colds, croup, and whooping cough."

Mrs. D. Gileson, Youngstown, O., writes: "My little girl had a severe cold and coughed almost continuously. I tried lots of cough remedies, but she didn't get any better. My sister recommended Poley's Honey and Tar Compound to me. The first dose I gave her relieved the inflammation in her throat, and after using one bottle the cough left her."

This sterling old remedy has been in use for years and is just as efficient for adults as for children. It gives relief for irritated and tickling throat, tight and sore chest, grippe and bronchial coughs.

On the Trail

I PEEKED around a bit last night. I thought I'd like to get a sight of old man Santa Claus. I came a-sneakin' down the stair And hid behind the parlor chair, As still as two small baby hairs With butter on their paw.

I sat, and sat, and sat, and sat. All crunched up like a Hottentot. And skurried breath at all. 'Twas awful dark and kind o' weird, And as the hours disappeared I felt myself a-gettin' skeered At noises in the hall.

And then old Sandy came in view. He wore a shaggy coat and two Big goggles on his eyes. He wore a pair of motor mitts As fuzzy as a pussy kit's And wool cap like my mother knits For daddykin's surprise.

He whistled once or twice, and then He coughed like a settlin' hen Or like a rooster does. "He'll never know me now!" said he While flakin' up the Christmas trees. But old man Sandy can't fool me— I knew just who he was! —Carlyle Smith in Denver Republican.

The Greek Orthodox Christmas

ACCORDING to the Greek and Russian calendar, Christmas comes thirteen days after the day that is generally observed in this country—that is, on Jan. 7. In the colonies of the two races in American cities the day is celebrated by prayer, feasting and much merrymaking. The Greek Orthodox churches are crowded to the doors, men and women bringing candles, which they place before the shrines.

In the Greek and Russian restaurants and clubs there is feasting, and the restaurants of the better class are decorated with laurel wreaths and pine trees. The poorer places have artificial wreaths of paper.

In the Russian homes in the cities there are Christmas trees with presents for the children, just as there are on Dec. 25 in homes of other nationalities. Scores of children gather in homes to sing Russian hymns and songs.

In the homes of the Greeks also there are Christmas trees for the children. The older folk receive money and gifts on the Greek New Year.

The Inquisitive Antelope

An antelope is as curious as a woman. If the hunter will lie down in the grass and wave a red handkerchief a band of antelopes will keep circling around until within reasonable distance for a safe shot. After completing a circle the antelopes halt suddenly and bring down one fore foot with a vigorous stamp on the ground, and at the same instant they make a sort of snort that sounds like a half whistle. This is the propitious moment for a hunter to shoot them with rifle bullets.

Temperance

(Conducted by the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union.)

LIQUOR TRAFFIC A PERIL.
Prohibition is inevitable in this country, says the Boston Advertiser. With practically the whole world conceding that alcohol is a bad handicap to any nation, and that the abolition of its use means a healthy—not an artificial—increase in the efficiency of the average producer, public sentiment in this country is going to wipe out the saloon, just as it has wiped out such nuisances as the polluted public or private water supply, or the manufacture of poisoned foods or embalmed meatstuffs. They were abolished because they were a danger to national safety and efficiency. And the saloon is certain to be abolished in precisely the same way and for precisely the same reason.

TWO PLAGUES.
The great white plague, tuberculosis, kills 100,000 persons a year; $8,000,000 was spent last year to destroy it and prevent its further spread. All are working to destroy it. Plague two, the liquor traffic, kills yearly from 500,000 to 700,000. Suppose that 200,000 doctors, 200,000 nurses, 50,000 grave diggers, 10,000 casket and coffin makers, should petition congress, petition legislatures, demand of politicians that tuberculosis must not be stamped out. Their trades, professions, prosperity demand that the plague be left at liberty, just licensed and regulated. A worldwide cry of horror would arise. But that is what we do with the worse plague of the liquor traffic—Exchange.

AS LIQUOR SELLER SEES IT.
Being interviewed by a newspaper reporter on the subject of prohibition—one which is on everybody's tongue—Barney Grogan, a well-known Chicago liquor dealer, had this to say: "If they voted the wet-dry question in Chicago some Sunday morning the whole city would go dry. It's the men and women who are wet personally who will finally decide the issue. They are flopping about and will try it as an experiment. Maybe they will go back—maybe not. They don't know exactly where they are at—especially the morning after pay day. But the prohibition wave is getting bigger every day."

POINT WELL TAKEN.
Last year the Illinois legislature voted to found a colony for epileptics. In a number of states there are already well established institutions. A home for these unfortunate is necessary, but why did we not likewise ten years ago establish a hospital for those wounded and maimed in the insane celebration of the Fourth of July? Instead, we instituted the sane Fourth and almost completely did away in a decade with any need of medical care whatever for our celebrants. Alcohol as a drink must go. It is an economic absurdity.—Charles F. Read, M. D., Illinois Medical Journal.

MODEL FARM.
A great model farm on which no liquor shall be sold, and where instruction in stock raising and farming shall be given for the benefit of the public, is provided for by the will of William R. Nelson, former editor and owner of the Kansas City Star. The clause relating to liquor reads, "No person shall, during the thirty-year period set on said lands any spirituous, malt or vinous liquors of any kind."

REDUCED TAXES.
The tax rate for Juniata county, Pa., has been reduced from 5 to 4 1/2 mills. As there was a decrease of $33,000 in the debt of the county during one year of curtailed license and two years of absolutely no license, the county commissioners felt they could afford to grant this reduction to the taxpayers. Juniata county maintains no almshouse and finds little use for one even under the present business depression.

PATRIOTIC DUTY.
General Joffre, communicating his decree of prohibition for the French army to the newspapers at Nancy, said: "It is the duty of all patriots to fight alcoholism in all its forms. Everyone must understand that anything capable of diminishing the moral and material strength of our army constitutes a real crime against national defense in face of the enemy."

BARLEYCORN'S INFLUENCE.
"I have recently reported on a separate study of 269 murderers. Alcohol was used to excess by 41.5 per cent, while but 12.6 per cent were abstainers. Nearly half were under the influence of alcohol when the crime was committed and 27.9 per cent had a history of previous arrest for drunkenness."—Dr. Rook Sleyster in Everybody's.

CHAMPION OF ABSTINENCE.
The Grand Duke Nicholas Nicholasavitch, commanding the entire Russian army, stands six feet seven inches high, drinks no wine and is accredited with the abolition of vodka in the army. "A drunken soldier cannot shoot straight," he said when mobilization for the present war came up.

TEST OF PATRIOTISM.
That teetotalism is about to become a test of patriotism in Great Britain is the opinion of the Nation, a London publication.

MADONNA and the ANGELS—BOUGUEREAU

It Came Upon the Midnight Clear

Christmas Processional Hymn

ST. URSULA C. M. D. F. WESTLAKE

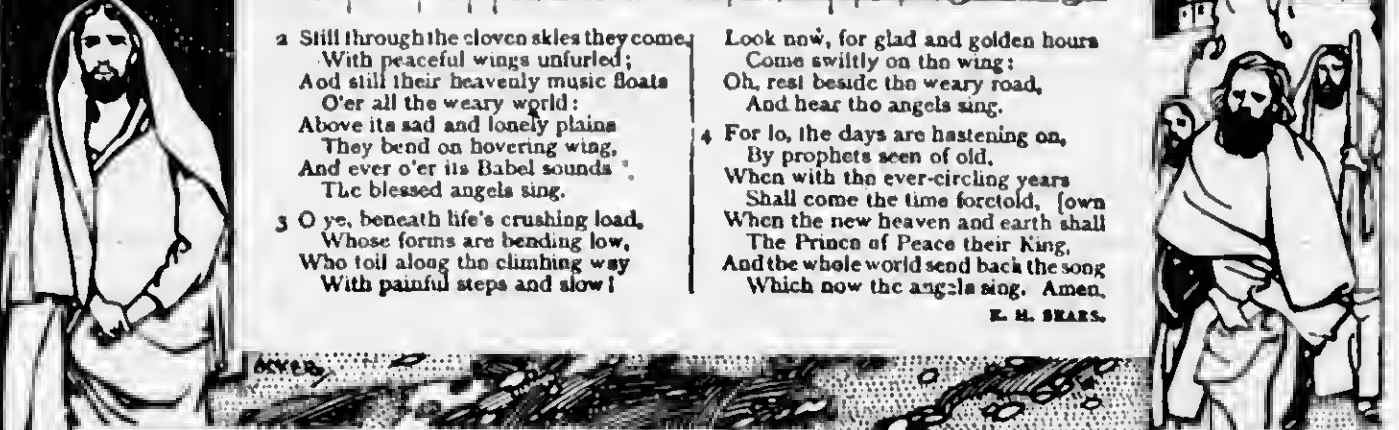

1. It came up on the midnight clear, That glo-ri-ous song of old,
From an-gels bend-ing near the earth To touch their harps of gold;
Peace on the earth, good-will to men, From heav-en's all-gracious King;
The world in sol-ern still-ness lay To hear the an-gels sing A-men.

2. Still through the cloven skies they come, With peaceful wings unfurled;
And still their heavenly music floats O'er all the weary world;
Above its sad and lonely plains They bend on hovering wing,
And ever o'er its babel sounds, The blessed angels sing.

3. O ye, beneath life's crushing load, Whose forms are bending low,
Who toil along the climbing way With painful steps and slow!
Look now, for glad and golden hours Come swiftly on the wing;
Oh, rest beside the weary road, And hear the angels sing.

4. For lo, the days are hastening on, By prophets seen of old,
When with the ever-circling years Shall come the time foretold,
When the new heaven and earth shall be, The Prince of Peace their King,
And the whole world send back the song Which now the angels sing. Amen.

On Supreme Bench.

Northern Michigan Entitled to Representation—Mayne Choice of the North.

At the coming Republican state convention a candidate for justice of the supreme court of Michigan will be nominated to succeed the late Justice McAlvay, whose death made vacant the only position on the supreme bench filled by a Northern Michigan jurist.

Charlevoix county and the thirteenth judicial circuit have in Judge Frederick W. Mayne a scholar, lawyer, judge and man who excels in all that these terms imply. His many years' experience as a general practitioner, his knowledge of men and public affairs, his broad and sound views concerning the administration of the law by the courts are well known and recognized throughout the state and distinguish him not only as a man of Northern Michigan, but of the whole state, capable of rendering the people valuable service in this honorable and important position.

Therefore resolved by the Charlevoix County Bar Association, That we, who have had an intimate association with Judge Mayne for many years and who know and appreciate his character and worth, do here and now most sincerely and earnestly commend and endorse him to the people of this state as one of the very best men of Michigan available for this important trust.

Resolved further, That this association and its members individually and collectively pledge our best endeavors from now until after the election to the work of securing the nomination and election of Judge Mayne to the office of justice of the supreme court.

Card of Thanks

To the many friends and neighbors who so kindly tendered their sympathy and labored with us so smoothly our path of pain and suffering we extend our heartfelt thanks.

Harvey Cutler.

THEATRICAL

Mr. Earle Williams of the Vitagraph Players certainly can be considered the Beau Brummel of the screen, for it is considered beyond question that he is the best-dressed and handsomest man now appearing before the camera.

As John Storm in "The Christian," which will be played at Majestic Theatre December 27, his Adonis-like attributes were rudely shaken. In one scene in which he is supposed to have been the cause of inciting panic and riots in the slums of London a mob of 3000 howling, shrieking, panic-stricken men, women and children were thrown against him. When Mr. Williams was a youngster at college he was a football enthusiast, but never in the roughest scrimmage of all did he receive such treatment as was accorded to him by those 3000 extra people in making the film. With them he fought like one possessed, as can be seen by his performance in "The Christian." When it was all over he was bruised from head to foot. A doctor was necessary to ease his sore joints and for more than a week he was unable to appear at the studio.

This is one of the features of motion pictures that is never encountered in the theatre, for the very simple reason that no actor in the theatre can afford to take such chances. He has to appear the next night and go through the performance again. But not so with the moving picture actor. He can throw his whole heart, and soul and body, too, into the part, and to their credit it must be said that many of them act exactly like Mr. Williams. It matters not to them if they are laid up in the hospital for a week or two after playing a strenuous scene. It is all part of their everyday work. The scene must be done true to life and if a fight is demanded it must be a real fight and no make-believe tea party affair, such as is generally seen on the stage.

Mr. Williams, as a matter of course, played John Storm in "The Christian" took his terrific beating, administered many hard knocks in return, spent his vacation under the doctor's care, with a huge bottle of liniment as his principal companion, recovered, returned to another picture, and is still full of fight in order to provide amusement for his legion of admirers.

Notice to Norwood Taxpayers.

I will be at the Charlevoix State Savings Bank, Charlevoix, Michigan, for the collection of taxes, on Friday December, 24, 1915, and on Saturday January 8, 1916.

The Children's Christmas Gift

Nine out of ten studies you are today teaching your children, they will never use in after life. The knowledge of how to accumulate money you are not teaching them. Yet without that knowledge they cannot succeed in life. Give each child this Christmas a Bank Book, $1.00, $5.00, $10.00—whatever sum you may choose.

It's the only kind of education costing money where they get the education and still keep the money.

HAPPENINGS In Our Live Town

Mrs. T. E. Boss is numbered among the sick.
Gao. Hillman is working in the store for Wallace Weiss.

A public dance will be given Friday night of this week.

The band concert last Friday evening was attended by a fair crowd.

Ellie Larsen is again seen at the local post office, much to the satisfaction of its patrons.

Frank Shannon of Traverse City is in the village in the interests of the Oval Wood Dish Company.

Dr. Beuker has moved to town for the winter and will occupy the Eastcott house on Harris street.

The Christmas number of the Courier was received with much comment and enjoyment by its subscribers.

John and Mae Skow returned home Friday from Indiana, where they have been attending Taylor University.

Mr. and Mrs. George Drenth are the proud parents of a baby girl, which came to make their home with them Monday, December 13th.

The local schools will close Thursday of this week to allow the teachers to return to their homes for Christmas. Two weeks vacation this year.

Basketball practice is on in earnest, a goodly number getting out for the team each time. It looks as though Ellsworth might put a pretty good team in the field.

School Notes

Ellsworth School Notes

Leonard Hillman was absent Friday.
Ava Nell Barclay entered the second grade Monday.

Maude Best was a visitor at school Thursday afternoon.

Margaret Harris was absent last week on account of sickness.

Lulu and Mary Shug entered the 2nd and 1st grades Monday of the past week.

Bessie Madill left school Monday of last week, expecting to return Monday after Christmas.

The ninth graders with the assistance of the teacher are making a book-keeping cabinet.

Very few have been absent the past week, although there has been some very bad weather.

The primary and intermediate rooms are busy preparing for their Christmas programs and trees.

Commissioner Beiding spent a few moments with us Tuesday morning, giving us a short talk.

After Christmas the pupils of the high school room are to take up wood block and stitch designing.

The bookkeeping class are beginning practical business. They are also working on short cuts in arithmetic.

We are looking forward with great anticipation to our two weeks vacation, which begins Friday of this week.

Ida Shug and Alida and John Beuker entered the eighth and seventh grades of the high school room last week.

All the seats in the high school room are occupied and two more had to be added to make room for the pupils.

Essex School Notes

The children are enjoying coasting.
Our new heating system has arrived.
Dena Hennip was home over Sunday.

Andrew Alkema visited school Monday.

School will close Thursday for one week.
Martha Dekkenga spent Sunday at Fieldstra's.

Gerret Drenth has been suffering with an ulcerated tooth.

Mr. and Mrs. Walter Merow visited at Drenth's Sunday.

Albert and Allen Aardemia expect to leave for Chicago Wednesday.

Several children were absent because of the stormy weather last week.

Mrs. E. Tillotson and son Edward attended the farmers' institute at Eastport.

Our school program will be given Thursday afternoon. Everybody welcome.

The stork visited at the home of George Drenth December 13th and left them a girl.

We all hope the many repairs which are needed on the school will be looked after during vacation.

Beatrice Vreland was absent from school last week Thursday and Friday on account of sickness.

A number of friends and relatives spent Wednesday evening at the home of Mrs. Nellie Dennis.

Mr. and Mrs. Willis Dennis of Wisconsin were here to attend the funeral of Mrs. Julia Dennis.

Edward Tillotson shipped the following furs Thursday: Two wildcats, one skunk, one mink, one coon.

Mrs. Nellie Dennis attended the funeral of her grandmother, Mrs. Julia Dennis of East Jordan, last week Monday.

Cora Bronkema lost her crocheted hook somewhere on the school grounds Wednesday. Finder please return to the same.

Mrs. Emily Wileland returned home Friday from Grand Rapids, where she has been attending McLachlan Business University.

Star School Notes

(Gale Sweet)

Gale Sweet is editor this week.
Miss Cleo Thorne will spend part of her vacation at Charlevoix.

The students of the Star school are proud of their new blackboards.

The fifth grade is busy making booklets the shape of a bolly leaf, and placing the paintings of winter scenes in them.

President Wilson's message to congress was read Monday to the pupils of the school by their teacher, Miss Cleo Thorne.

The seventh and eighth grades of the Star school have finished the building of a stage in the school room for their Christmas program.

The original idea of each pupil in the decorating of their school room for Christmas has proven to work out in a beautiful success. The large fireplace, the mistletoe, and the Christmas bells, were arranged very realistic. It proves the teacher and students have real, true Christmas.

Wright School District

Examinations began Monday morning. School will close Friday for a week's vacation.

Marjorie DeMoupled visited school Monday afternoon.

Roy Campbell was absent Monday on account of sickness.

Helen McElroy has been absent a few days on account of bad roads.

On account of bad roads our program and Christmas tree will be held Thursday afternoon.

Mr. McMillan threw out his hand to prevent his falling and fell on an axe which his brother was carrying, cutting a deep gash in his right hand.

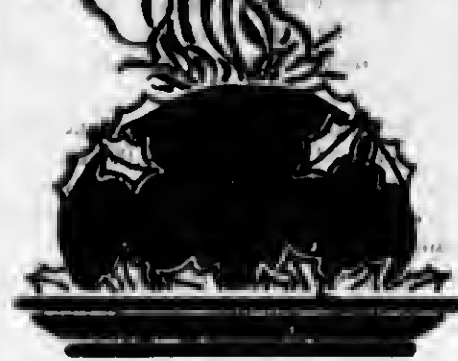

St. George and St. Peter.

Besides being the patron saint of England St. George is also patron of Moscow, on whose arms there figures the picture of the saint slaying the dragon. A famous Russian military decoration—the Order of St. George—was founded by Catherine the second—also commemorates the saint in Russia. It may incidentally be pointed out that while St. George was adopted as the "military protector" of England early in the thirteenth century the patron of England had for five centuries previously been St. Peter, which helps to explain why more churches have in England been dedicated to that saint than to any other.—London Mirror.

It is the custom on Christmas day to present the stomach with a substantial gift.

Like other Christmas tokens, it should be well selected, not too rich, certainly not oppressively so—a gift that will be well received on sight and pleasantly remembered until next Christmas comes around.

Just as the materials are arranged in a room, just so should a Christmas dinner be planned. Nothing should crowd, nothing jar. Harmony in choice and in setting should be displayed. In a room the furniture occupies the substantial positions, those of weights; the next strata may be the bric-a-brac; then come the lighter ornaments and, finally, the small appointments to fill in where needed.

A well selected dinner leaves no one with a sense of fullness. Hygiene gives to the one who selects it, he it housewife or professional caterer, a knowledge of the fitness and requirements. Weight and lightness are nicely balanced, substance and fluff well combined, acids cut the sweetness, and the drinkables assist all. That is an ideal dinner.

An American gentleman, visiting a Scotchman, partook of dinner at the latter's shooting box. After the meal, though no one had drunk much, there was such a feeling of fullness that no one could rise.

"Oh, the shame of it!" said the American. "My chef would have died of mortification had such a thing happened at my table."

Below are given recipes for this well balanced dinner menu:

Celery and Roquefort.

Select short, tender stalks of celery, leaving on leaves; wash and chill thoroughly. Work three-fourths tablespoonful butter until creamy and add one and one-half tablespoonfuls Roquefort cheese. Season with salt, pepper and paprika and spread on inside of celery stalks. Serve on crushed ice.

Roast Turkey.

Dress, clean, truss and roast a twelve pound turkey. Remove to hot platter and garnish with celery tips.

Giblet Stuffing.

Chop cooked giblets very fine. Split sixteen common crackers and spread with butter, allowing one-fourth tablespoonful to each half. Pour over two and three-fourth cupfuls of stock in which giblets were cooked. When crackers have taken up stock add chopped giblets and season with salt and pepper.

Frozen Cranberries.

Pick over and wash four cupfuls of cranberries. Add one and one-half cupfuls of boiling water and two and one-fourth cupfuls of sugar and let boil twelve minutes, skimming twice during the cooking. Run through a sieve, cool and fill to overflowing one-half pound of baking powder boxes with mixture. Pack in salt and ice, using equal parts, and let stand four hours.

Glazed Silver Skins.

Peel twelve small onions and cook in boiling salted water until tender. Drain thoroughly and saute in three tablespoonfuls of butter, to which is added one tablespoonful of sugar, until delicately browned.

FARMERS QUERY COLUMN

Mail All Questions to This Office or to H. L. Barnum, Ironton, Michigan

In the future a column under the above heading will appear regularly in the Courier. This column will be devoted to answering various questions relating to stock raising, stock feeding, soil management, etc. Farmers or stock men desiring information on any subject along this line are invited to send written questions either direct to this office or to Mr. Barnum at Ironton. The following week, or as soon thereafter as the questions can be answered, they will appear in the Courier under this heading. Watch for it every week, as it may contain the answer to some puzzling condition that is confronting you. Do not be afraid to ask any questions along these lines, as the answer and solution of your trouble will be cheerfully given in detail. Make this column an interesting one, and thus profit thereby.

Question—For growing pigs should corn be fed in the ear, shelled, or ground to meal to secure the best results?

Answer—In feeding animals for profit a person aims to get the biggest possible net returns from the feed consumed; therefore, in this case, the cost of shelling and grinding the corn and preparing it for use must be taken into account. At the Iowa Experiment Station over three hundred pigs of all ages were fed in groups on corn variously prepared, but under otherwise similar conditions. In this test dry ear corn, soaked shelled corn, and dry and soaked corn meal were used. The results gave soaked shelled corn a small margin of advantage over the whole corn and both were ahead of the meal. In general, however, as the experimenters reported, "The scoop shovel is all that is needed to prepare corn for swine." Iowa Bul. 106.

Question—Under what conditions is meat meal used as a hog feed?

Answer—Meat meal, and blood meal, are both used to balance a ration of corn fed exclusively; to take the place of milk and protein, feeds for sows and young pigs; and in general, to supply protein, the growth and strength producing element, where it is lacking. As usually fed meat meal forms from six to ten per cent. of the whole ration.

G. J. DIEKEMA FOR GOVERNOR

Holland Man is Growing in Popularity
Every Day

Home People are Enthusiastically Behind His Candidates as Well as Other Section in State.

G. J. Diekema was born in the city of Holland, Michigan, March 27th, 1859, and is of Holland descent. He was educated in the public schools of Holland and at Hope College, from which institution he graduated with the degree of A. B. in 1881. Since then his Alma Mater has conferred upon him the degree of A. M. and LL. D.

After teaching school for a term, he went to Ann Arbor to study law and graduated in 1883. He immediately commenced the practice of his profession in his home city and is now the head of the law firm of Diekema, Kollen & Ten Cate.

In politics young Diekema was a Republican and was elected as a member of the state legislature in November, 1884. He represented his district for eight consecutive years. In 1887 he was chairman of the judiciary committee and in 1889 was elected as speaker of the house. In 1891 the state had gone Democratic and he was elected leader of the minority.

In his home town he has held the offices of member of the school board, city attorney, and mayor.

In 1893 he was the Republican candidate for attorney general and, although he received nearly 1000 more votes than were cast for Hon. John T. Rich, who was elected governor, he was defeated on account of a fusion of Democrats and Populists, who fused on this office only. He was then appointed by Gov. Rich as president of the Michigan municipal commission and drafted the general village and fourth class city charters.

In 1896 he was a delegate to the National Republican Convention which nominated William McKinley.

For ten years, from 1900 to 1910, he was chairman of the Republican state central committee and never lost a fight. His leadership produced great party harmony and most efficient party organization.

In 1901 he was appointed by President McKinley as a member of the Spanish treaty claims court in Washington, where he served for six years, passing upon $65,000,000 of war claims against the United States.

In 1907 he was elected to congress from the fifth district to succeed Hon. William Alden Smith, who had been promoted to the senate, and served his district in congress for two terms.

In 1912 he was chairman of the speakers' bureau of the national Republican committee, with headquarters at Chicago.

In 1913 he was appointed by the board of mediation and conciliation as a member of the board of arbitration between the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad and its employees.

Through his executive ability Diekema early combined business with the law and at the present time he is president of the First State Bank of Holland, chairman of the board of directors of the Grand Haven State Bank, president of the DePree Chemical Company, of the Thompson Manufacturing Company, and director and stockholder in many other business enterprises.

There are few cities and villages in Michigan where his voice has not been heard, and during political campaigns he is always in great demand throughout the middle west states. He delivered the oration for his class in Ann Arbor, the oration at the World's Fair in Chicago on Netherlands Day, the oration on Michigan Day at the Pan-American Exposition at Buffalo, and while in congress he was a ready debater, always securing and holding the attention of the whole house. His associates from New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Baltimore and other great cities within easy reach of Washington made constant demands upon him to speak at public functions held in their cities. Speaking of his oratorical ability, we quote from the Marquette Mining Journal of June 19th the following:

"Mr. Diekema is one of our great orators. This is a title that few men in Michigan can claim with justice. He wins it by reason of a magnetic presence, a mind capable of lofty thought and a diction that expresses his thought with clarity. Thus he is an orator."

Above is the life history of Garrit J. Diekema, who will go before the people of Michigan in the August primaries, asking for the highest office the state can give him. In his home and neighboring towns clubs have been formed to boost his candidacy. He has the backing almost to a man in many sections of the state. Mr. Diekema is fully qualified to fill the office he seeks and it is our opinion that the voters of Michigan would make a wise selection in choosing Mr. Diekema for governor.

WARNING TO FISHERMEN

Allowed to Spear Fish But Two Months Under New Law.

The state game and fish department calls the attention of winter fishermen and sportsmen to the new law governing the spearing of fish through the ice. The new act has narrowed the time by two months during which fish may be speared. It is now lawful to spear fish through the ice only during the months of January and February. It is feared that many fishermen believe that the same law holds as in 1914 by which they were allowed to spear fish during December, January, February and March.

CLUB ROOMS ARE NOW OPEN

Basement of Baptist Church Headquarters for Boy Scouts.

Citizens Requested to Co-Operate in Movement—Membership Daily Increasing.

The formal opening of the rooms in the basement of the Baptist church, to be used for the Charlevoix Boy Scouts of America and the Charlevoix Athletic Association, took place in the church parlors Monday evening. The opening was well attended by Charlevoix citizens and the younger element.

The program opened with music, to be followed by a lengthy discourse by Rev. L. C. Vinyard, scout master, on the subject, "What We are Doing." Mr. Vinyard outlined the work and what is sought to be accomplished. He stated that he had received a liberal response from Charlevoix citizens so far, and that in the future, after the results of the movement were more evident, the interest would more than double.

This was followed by a vocal solo by Frank Poole, who received a hearty encore. Rev. C. E. Taggart then spoke in glowing terms of the work already accomplished, and predicted a wonderful future for the Boy Scouts of Charlevoix. Other musical number completed the program, after which the assembled guests were served hot chocolate and wafers by the boy scouts.

While the club rooms are not as yet complete, a wonderful amount of work has been accomplished. The rooms are nicely fitted up with reading tables and games of various kinds. Literature dear to the boy's heart is furnished in abundance, and hardly an hour of the day passes that a happy bunch of youngsters are not in the rooms, either playing games or deeply interested in a book or a magazine.

The interest manifested by the young members is surprising and each takes upon himself the duty of strictly living up to all rules and regulations as to conduct and behavior.

The rooms are a place where the young boys of Charlevoix can spend their leisure time without being subjected to the evils and temptations usually found when they congregate on the street corners and public buildings. During the coming week a complete canvass of the city will be made and the membership greatly increased. The movement is a very commendable one, and Rev. Vinyard deserves the hearty

The OLD YEAR and the NEW @ HARLOWE RANDALL HOYT

THE New Year comes. The Old Year goes. Adown the pathway of the years, Bent 'neath his pack of joys and woes,
Of Junetide smiles and April tears,
Across the fields with snowdrift white,
The Old Year passes on tonight.

A TWELVEMONTH past we welcomed him—
A New Year he, one year ago,
But now his eye is weak and dim,
He totters on with footstep slow,
His voice, complaining on the breeze,
Comes in the groaning of the trees.

WE watched him grow. The wintertime Ebb'd into spring, and summer, then
We saw him pulse with virile pride
When autumn fields were ripe again,
And now, we view him at the last,
Nipped by December's chilling blast.

WELL, let him go. His race is run.
He was a goodly Year, indeed.
So let us toast him, every one,
And bid the wanderer "God-speed!"
Old Year, a final health to you!
You were a comrade, tried and true.

THE Old Year goes. The New Year stands
Before the door and waits us here.
Ho, bring him in with welcome hands.
The Year is dead! Long live the Year!

CHRISTMAS MADE BRIGHTER

B. P. O. E. of Petoskey and Local Members Supply Many with Christmas Dinners.

Last Friday afternoon O. D. Hammond acted the role of Santa Claus in behalf of the Petoskey Lodge of Elks, of which many Charlevoix citizens are members. Mr. Hammond delivered twelve bushel baskets filled to the top with Christmas cheer to as many homes and gladdened the hearts of 49 children whose Xmas outlook was filled with desolation and aching hearts.

Each basket was labelled to the head of the family and also stated the number of children to be helped. They contained turkeys, chickens, doughnuts, bread, for the Christmas dinner, and a horn for each child and other goodies that please every child. Thus was Christmas duly enjoyed by many and the cheerful giving was properly fraternalized by the members of the B. P. O. E.

Other Christmas charities were freely extended in many homes where the necessities of life were stringently needed. Taken as a whole, the needy ones of Charlevoix were well supplied for their Christmas dinners.

SPECIAL POMONA MEETING JAN. 21

County Grangers to Meet with Pine Lake Grange, Near Boyne City.

State Speaker W. M. Coon of Roscommon to Have Charge of the Program.

There will be a special meeting of Charlevoix County Pomona Grange held with Pine Lake Grange, Friday, January 21st. This will be one of the many special Pomona meetings simultaneously held throughout the state by grange leaders to promote the welfare of the Patrons of Husbandry and stimulate the interest in the effort to increase the membership.

W. M. Coon of Roscommon, one of the state speakers, will have charge of the program. His topics will be:

1st—Survey of the Field.
2nd—Increasing our Trade Contract.
3rd—The New Grange Movement for 1916.

4th—What Can We Do To Promote Subordinate Grange Growth During 1916?

The topics the speaker will dwell on are of vital interest to all grangers, and a good attendance is desired. Mr. Coon is a very capable speaker, and grangers will be well repaid for their attendance.

Pine Lake Grange is able to take care of all who attend and extends a welcome to meet with them.

AGED PIONEER DIES

Had Been a Resident of North Bay for Over Thirty-Five Years.

The funeral of Mrs. Dora Hauk, an aged pioneer resident of North Bay township, was held from the Evangelical church at Horton Bay, Wednesday, December 15th, Rev. G. G. Heximer conducting the services.

Deceased was born March 12th, 1845, in Wurtenburg, Germany, and died in the hospital at Petoskey December 13th. Some forty years ago she was married to her now sorrowing husband. They came to America in 1868, locating in Sandusky, Ohio. Later they moved to Caledonia, Michigan, and from there to North Bay, where they have, since resided. One daughter had preceded the mother, only the husband surviving.

INCREASE YOUR BEET ACREAGE

Contracts for 1916 Now Being Written by Local Representatives.

Facts and Figures Relating to Sugar Beet Crop in County During 1915.

The last carload of Charlevoix grown beets for 1915 was loaded at the weighing station near the old auger factory site on Saturday last and started on its way to the factory Monday morning.

According to a statement made by W. E. Byers, who had charge of the weighing station, and J. R. Cooper, who represented the company in regard to acreage, there were 74 cars containing 2224 tons of beets sent out of Charlevoix during the 1915 season.

The Charlevoix weighing station was a busy place throughout the entire season. When the final order came from headquarters to load all the beets onto cars and ship them not later than the 27th, 24 men were in the employ of the company. Ton after ton of beets laid on the ground ready for shipment and when the final order came they were covered with snow, frozen from the top of the piles in some instances to a depth of three feet. It was necessary to use a pick to break into the mass.

From figures given out there were 1115 wagon loads delivered at Charlevoix station, hauled from the fields a distance of from one to ten miles. Altogether there was a total acreage of between 400 and 410 acres grown. In some instances a shortage of help during the picking and thinning period caused considerable inconvenience to the grower, and consequently a small tonnage per acre. But, regardless of this, the grower was satisfied with the returns.

At the Phelps weighing station over 240 tons were delivered, weighed and shipped. At Ellsworth the total tonnage was smaller than at Phelps, but the sentiment there is that more than double the 1915 acreage will be sown during 1916.

Charlevoix and Antrim county farmers are fully alive to the beet situation. The poor, backward season during 1915 has been a lesson to them. It has shown that a good crop of beets can be grown in this section regardless of climatic conditions. When the beans and potatoes were nipped by frosts during both spring and fall and the crops almost a failure, the sugar beet grower wore "the smile that won't come off" and pointed with pride to the only crop that netted him a profit during the year.

It might be of benefit to those opposed to sugar beet growing to do a little figuring on the results of the past year. Two thousand two hundred and twenty-four tons of beets shipped from the Charlevoix weighing station brought in hard cash to the growers $13,344, besides the large amount of tops that are used for feeding purposes. Nor does this include in any manner the great value added to the land under cultivation, which cannot be estimated. It also means placing Charlevoix county on the map as one of the best, if not the best, beet-producing counties in the state. Beets grown in Charlevoix county produce the highest sugar test of any grown in Michigan and are, therefore, in great demand. It explains, also, why the Holland-St. Louis Sugar Company can pay the average price and at the same time go to the heavy expense of handling and shipping Charlevoix grown beets to the Holland and St. Louis factories.

The Holland-St. Louis Sugar Co., through their local representative, are now writing contracts for 1916 acreage. The price per ton, $6.00, will prevail through the coming year. It is thought that over a third increase in acreage will be contracted. The company is willing to contract as many acres as possible, and the farmer who is after the best returns for his year's work will take increased acreage.

SYNOPSIS.

John Bellamy Smart, unmarried and heir to a fortune, while abroad with his secretary, Poopondyke, and his valet, Britton, buys a dilapidated old castle on the Danube, in care of the Schmicks, and discovers a mysterious woman inhabiting one of the towers.

Smart fails to batter down a huge door leading to the east wing in search of the fair lady. He interrupts a visit of American relic hunters.

Their amusing attempt to buy some of the castle's ancient furniture results in their disclosure and hurried departure. Smart catches a glimpse of his fair neighbor's waving hair.

Another visit to the mysterious east wing fails, but inter the beautiful arrangement strikes up an acquaintance with the new owner through a secret loophole.

She agrees to entertain him at tea. Meanwhile he learns the history of the old castle from the Schmicks and receives a visit from a crowd of tourists.

Refusing to be put off by the fair charmer's plea of a headache, Smart battles down the doors to the maiden's apartments, where a surprise awaits him.

He learns she is a rich American girl, divorced from her nobleman husband, and is in hiding, having kidnapped her own baby.

The Hazards, friends of Smart, visit the castle, bringing with them the countess's husband, masquerading as Mr. Pless. Smart learns the villain's identity.

CHAPTER VIII.

"The count—my husband."

My face fell.
She couldn't have been a day over twenty-two. But she had a baby!

Facing me once more, she said:
"Doubtless you are very much puzzled by my presence in this gloomy old castle. You have been asking yourself a thousand questions about me, and you have been shocked by my outrageous impositions upon your good nature. I am here, Mr. Smart, because it is the last place in the world where my husband would be likely to look for me."

"Your husband? Look for you?"
"Yes. I shall be quite frank with you. My husband and I have separated. A provisional divorce was granted, however, just seven months ago. The final decree cannot be issued for one year."

"But why should you hide from him?"

"The—the court gave him the custody of our child during the probationary year. I— I have run away with her. They are looking for me everywhere. That is why I came here. Do you understand?"

I was stunned. "Then, I take it, the court granted him the divorce and put you?" I said, experiencing a sudden chill about the heart. "You were deprived of the child, I see. Dear me!"

"You are mistaken," she said, a dash in her eyes. "It was an Austrian court. The count—my husband, I should say—is an Austrian subject. His interests must be protected." She said this with a sneer on her pretty lips.

"You see, my father, knowing him now for what he really is, has refused to pay over to him something like a million dollars, still due for the marriage settlement. The count contends that it is a just and legal debt, and the court supports him to this extent: The child is to be his until the debt is cleared up, or something in that effect. I really don't understand the legal complications involved. Perhaps it were better if I did."

"I see," said I, scornful in spite of myself. "One of those happy international marriages where a bride is thrown in for good measure with a couple of millions. Won't we ever learn?"

"That's it precisely," she said, with the utmost calmness and candor. "American dollars and an American girl in exchange for a title, a lot of debts and a ruined life."

"And they always turn out just this way. What a lot of blithering fools we have in the land of the free and the home of the brave!"

"My father objected to the whole arrangement from the first, so you must not speak of him as a knave," she protested. "He doesn't like counts and such things."

"I don't see that it helps matters. I can hardly substitute the word 'brave' for the one I used," said I, trying to conceal my disgust.

"There's don't misunderstand me, Mr. Smart," she said laughingly. "I am not asking for pity. I made my bed, and I shall lie in it. The only thing I ask of you is, well, kindness."

She seemed to fancy again, and once more I was at her feet, figuratively speaking.

"You are in distress, in dread of something, madame?" I asked. "Consider me your friend."

She shook her head emphatically. "You poor man! You don't know what you are in for, I tell you. What till I have told

"I am not asking for pity."

you everything. Three weeks ago I found myself liable to imprisonment and heaven knows what else by abducting my little girl. That is really what it comes to—abduction. The court has ordered my arrest, and all sorts of police persons are searching high and low for me. Now don't you see your peril? If they find me here you will be in a dreadful predicament. You will be charged with criminal complicity, or whatever it is called, and—Oh, it will be frightfully unpleasant for you, Mr. Smart."

My expression must have convicted me. She couldn't help seeing the dismay in my face. So she went on quite humbly:

"Of course you have but to act at once and all may be well for you. I—I will go if you—if you command me to."

I struck my knee forcibly. "What do you take me for, madame? None the consequences! If you feel that you are safe here—that is, comparatively safe—stay!"

"It will be terrible if you get into trouble with the law," she murmured in distress. "I—I really don't know what might happen to you. Indeed, I do not."

Suddenly a horrible thought struck me with stunning force.

"Don't tell me that your—your husband is the man who owned this castle up to a week ago," I cried. "Count James Holendahl?"

She shook her head. "No. He is not the man." Seeing that I waited for her to go on, she resumed: "I know Count James quite well, however. He is my husband's closest friend."

"Good heaven," said I, in quick alarm. "That complicates matters, doesn't it? He may come here at any time."

"It isn't likely, Mr. Smart. To be perfectly honest with you, I waited until I heard you had bought the castle before coming here myself. We were in hiding at the house of a friend in Linz up to a week ago."

"May I inquire, madame," said I stiffly, "how you came to select my place as your hiding place?"

"Oh, I have forgotten to tell you that we lived here one whole summer just after we were married. Count Holendahl let us have the castle for our own honeymoon. He was here a great deal of the time. All sorts of horrid nasty, snobbish people were here to help us enjoy our honeymoon. I shall never forget that dreadful summer. My only friends were the Schmicks. You see they were in the family ages and ages before I was born."

"The family? What family?"

"The Holendahl family. Haven't they told you that my great-grandfather was a Holendahl? No? Well, she was. I belong to the third generation of American born descendants."

Doesn't it simplify matters, knowing this?"

"Humane," said I, in something of a daze.

"And so I came here, Mr. Smart, where hundreds of my ancestors spent their honeymoons, most of them perhaps as unhappily as I, and where I knew a fellow countryman was to live for awhile in order to get a plot for a new story. You see, I thought I might be a great help to you in the shape of suggestion."

She smiled very warmly, and I thought it was a very neat way of putting it. Naturally it would be quite impossible to put her out after hearing that she had already put herself out to some extent in order to assist me.

"I can supply the villain for your story if you need one, and I can give you oceans of ideas about noblemen. I am sorry that I can't give you a nice, sweet heroine. People hate heroines after they are married and live unhappily. You?"

"The public taste is changing," I interrupted quickly. "Unhappy marriages are so common nowadays that the women who go into 'em are always heroines. People like to read about suffering and anguish among the rich, too. Besides, you are a countess. That puts you near the first rank among heroines. Don't you think it would be proper at this point to tell me who you are?"

She regarded me steadfastly for a moment, and then shook her head.

"I'd rather not tell you my name, Mr. Smart. It really can't matter, you know. I've thought it all out very carefully, and I've decided that it is not best for you to know. You see if you don't know who it is you are sheltering the courts can't hold you to account. You will be quite innocent of deliberately contriving to defeat the law."

"No, I shall not tell you my name, nor my husband's, nor my father's. If you'd like to know, however, I will tell you my baby's name. She's two years old and I think she'll like you to call her Rosemary."

By this time I was quite hypnotized by this charming, confident trespasser upon my physical—and I was about to say my moral estate. Never have I known a more complacent violator of all the proprieties of law and order as she appeared to be. She was a revelation—more than that, she was an inspiration.

What an exceedingly courageous, independent, fascinating little buccaner she was!

"Rosemary," I repeated. "And what am I to call you?"

"Even my enemies call me countess," she said coldly.

"Oh," said I, more respectfully. "I see. When am I to have the pleasure of meeting the less particular Rosemary?"

"I didn't mean to be horrid," she said plaintively. "Please overlook it, Mr. Smart. If you are very, very quiet I think you may see her now. She is asleep."

"I may frighten her if she awakes," I said in haste, remembering my antipathy to babies.

Nevertheless I was led through a couple of bare, unadorned rooms into a sunny, perfectly domestic nursery. A nursemaid—English, at a glance—came from her seat in the window and held a cautious finger to her lips. In the middle of a bed that would have accommodated an entire family, was the sleeping Rosemary—a tiny, rosy cheeked, yellow haired atom bounded on four sides by yards of mattress.

I stood over her timorously and stared. The countess put one knee upon the mattress and, leaning far over, kissed a little paw. I blinked, like a confounded boob.

Then she stole out of the room.

"Isn't she adorable?" asked the countess when we were at a safe distance.

"They all are," I said grudgingly, "when they're asleep."

"You are horrid!"

"By the way," I said sternly, "how does that bedstead happen to be a yard or so lower than any other bed in this entire castle? All the rest of them are so high one has to get into them from a chair."

"Oh," she said complacently, "it was too high for Blake to manage conveniently, so I had Rudolph saw the legs off short."

One of my very finest antique bedsteads! But I didn't even groan a single groan.

"You will let me stay on, won't you, Mr. Smart?" she said when we were at the fireplace again. "I am really so helpless, you know."

I offered her everything that the castle afforded in the way of loyalty and luxury.

"And we'll have a telephone in the main hall before the end of a week," I concluded heartily.

Her face clouded. "Oh, I'd much rather live in my hallway, if you don't mind. You see, I can't very well go downstairs every time I want to use the phone, and it will be a nuisance sending for me when I'm wanted."

This was rather high handed, I thought.

"But if no one knows you're here it seems to me you're not likely to be called."

"You never can tell," she said mysteriously.

I promised to put the instrument in her hall and not to have an extension to my room for fear of creating suspicion. Also the electric bell system was to be put in just as she wanted it to be and a lot of other things that do not seem to come to mind at this moment.

I left in a daze at half past 11 to send Britton up with all the late novels and magazines.

Two years ago American business men voluntarily went to give the President and Congress the benefit of their knowledge and experience upon matters which were the subject of proposed legislation. President Wilson denounced them as an "insidious lobby" and drove them from the capital. In his message to Congress a few days ago the President indicated his intention to call business men into conference upon important government problems. Two years ago he wanted to hang some of them "higher than Haman." After putting the American business man through an experience little better than hanging, Mr. Wilson realizes that after all practical business knowledge is of great value and that even a college professor can learn from business men. But what a pity it is that Mr. Wilson took two years to find out his error! What a pity that American industry paid so dearly for Mr. Wilson's education!

Economy Hints

A penny saved is a penny earned.— Benjamin Franklin.

DID you ever stop to think that good care of the toothbrush is almost as essential as good care of the teeth? Yet how few persons really take the proper care of either! Nothing spoils a pretty face so quickly as bad teeth, and the girl who has any regard for her appearance will watch both her brush and her teeth.

It never pays to invest in a cheap toothbrush. In the first place a bad set of bristles leave their work half done. They have not the necessary stiffness and resistance to clean the teeth well. Then the bristles in a cheap brush are not well fastened and are apt to fall out. This makes a cheap toothbrush a real menace, for if the bristles come loose in the mouth they are apt to slip down the throat, catch there and decay, or they may pierce through the walls of the digestive tract.

Buy a good brush and then take care of it. Before you use a brush for the first time soak it in a weak solution of bicarbonate of soda for two hours. This not only serves to disinfect it from shop handling, but it sets the bristles so that they will not fall out so readily.

It is better not to use a toothbrush for a longer period than three weeks at a time, and it is wiser to keep two brushes going at once. In this way one can be drying out and airing while the other is in use. Be sure that the brush is well rinsed and thoroughly clean of all tooth paste or dirt before hanging it up to dry. Once a week let it boil in clear hot water for about five minutes to kill any germs which may be lingering in the bristles and to disinfect it well.

The teeth should be brushed after each meal, before retiring and upon arising in the morning. The nightly cleansing, so often neglected, is in reality the most important of all. It is essential to brush the teeth both inside and out before retiring, so that the food particles will not stay in the crevices and decay overnight. Once a day or twice at the most is often enough to use tooth paste or powder. At other times wash the teeth with clear water.

Very often after a long illness it will be found that the teeth have begun to decay. This is usually laid down to the nature of the illness. In reality it is more often due to neglect of the teeth than to the ailment itself. During illness the teeth should be cleaned, especially as they cannot be attended to by a dentist.

The best mouth wash, one which will help to harden the gums and will keep away tartar, can be made by dissolving a teaspoonful of bicarbonate of soda in ordinary table water in a pint of water. Bottle this and keep it on hand for use. It is quite as good a cleanser as peroxide, and it is not so hard on the teeth. The peroxide is said to wear the enamel away.

The Care of Foodstuffs.

As soon as meat or fish arrives from the market it should be examined to see if there are no eggs left by intruding flies.

flies. A wire safe in the cellar is the best place to hang meat. In mutton or in lamb the marrow or soft, fatty substance should be taken from the backbone, as also the thin membrane which appears under steaks and chops, as these decay quickly and, therefore, are liable to taint the whole piece. Never leave meat in paper, but put at once on a clean plate if it is not hung.

Fish should not be laid directly on artificial ice, as the ammonia used is apt to combine with the fish and cause ptomaine poisoning. Do not cover meat or fish tightly before being cooked and never cover cooked food such as soups, meats and vegetables while still hot. Let them cool as rapidly as possible, then cover. Bacon and hams may be kept in any cool place where there is plenty of cold air in circulation about them to prevent mildew. They are best hung, protected by bags of cloth or paper.

Fruits should be kept in a cool, dark place and separated as much as possible. Berries should be pointed on large plates or platters and spread out. If the watermelon is too large for the ice chest cover with a wet piece of sack and place where the wind will blow over it. The evaporation will make it delightfully cold. Lemons are best kept by wrapping in tissue paper and hanging in an openwork bag in a cool place. A bag made of netted white string is admirable for this purpose and can be washed when necessary.

Homemade Towels.

A lad has developed among fastidious women for making their own towels. They buy for the purpose fine French birdseye and French huck for their own personal use and German huck for general family use. Of course the fancy towels, which are lace trimmed and embroidered, are not honestly practical.

But those hemstitched are, and either the family linen or some quaint emblem in cross stitch, white or colors, makes a charming finish.

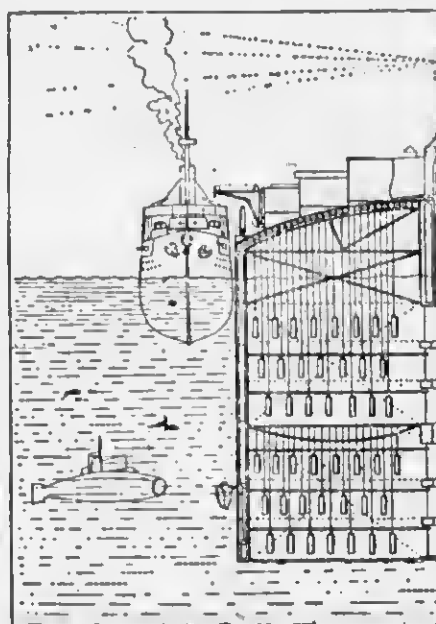

FLOATING NAVAL BASE.

Seagoing Coaling Station That May Be Sunk When Desired.

For nations that need naval coaling stations in distant parts of the world where they have no colonial possessions, a Russian inventor has designed a floating storehouse for fuel and other supplies, says Popular Mechanics.

Manned by a small crew of men, the floating naval base can be towed to any advantageous position and anchored ready to receive supplies from colliers and distribute them to war ships.

On the approach of a hostile fleet the entire naval base, crew and all, can be sunk out of sight, to reappear again as soon as danger is past. As patented, the floating storehouse is very much like a huge diving bell, cylindrical in shape, with double walls and roof containing compressed air tanks for regulating its height in the water. It has no bottom except a wire netting and is usually partly filled with water.

FLOATING NAVAL COALING STATION

All coal, petroleum and other naval supplies are received and stored in small water tight drums. From the receiving cranes on the roof the drums are moved to a well in the center, lowered to the proper depth and shunted off through windows in the well upon concentric tracks, where they remain suspended in the water until needed. All the handling is done by automatic machinery.

INDIANA COAL FIELDS.

First Working of the Mines Took Place Over a Century Ago.

Some knowledge of the coal resources of Indiana was obtained as early as 1801, when the public land surveys showed a number of outcrops. The report of the geological survey of Indiana published in 1872 states that in 1811 coal was dug at Fulton, in Perry county, and taken by Robert Fulton aboard the steamer Orleans on its first trip down the Ohio river. There is good reason to believe that coal continued to be mined for local consumption between 1811 and 1837, when the first attempt at commercial mining was made but there is no record of the quantity mined during that interval. The first commercial coal mining in Indiana, according to E. W. Parker of the United States geological survey, was done by the American Cannel Coal company at Cannelton, Perry county, in 1837. The coal was mined on the bluffs along the Ohio and Wabash rivers and for the first ten years of the company's operations was loaded directly into boats for shipment to points down the Ohio.

In 1840 the United States census reported that the production of coal in Indiana in that year was 1,682 tons. The industry developed slowly until 1865, when it was ascertained that the black coal mined in the Brazil and Terre Haute districts made a satisfactory blast furnace fuel in its raw condition. At about that time the construction of railroads throughout the state gave an impetus to the coal mining industry, which has shown steady progress except when affected by periods of depression and labor dissatisfactions.

Magneto Protection.

Sometimes after behaving well an engine will miss fire during a long run, and subsequently it will again behave itself properly. At the end of the run a thorough investigation may be made and everything may be found in order. This happens in a heavy rain when driving against a heavy rain and is due to water passing through the radiator on to the magneto, the water either settling on the high tension terminals or the sparking plug insulator. Proper magneto covers are sold, but in place of one of these a simple screen can easily be rigged up which will prevent the same trouble occurring from excessive rain on the part of the person who washes the car.

A Skyscraper Water Tank.

Skyscraper dimensions are generally associated with metropolitan office buildings, but on the Salmon river hydroelectric development in upper New York state a steel tank 205 feet tall has been built—an unprecedented height of a structure of this type. The tank will hold 1,400,000 gallons of water and its function is to act as a sort of safety valve by absorbing any sudden pressures, or surges as they are called, which might develop in the pipe line which feeds the turbines in the power house. Engineering Record.

To Remove Spark Plugs.

Spark plugs too tightly screwed in are hard to remove. Put a dam of putty around it to form a retaining cup with the plug in the center and allow kerosene to soak in around the plug for twelve hours.

CONSCIOUS VIRTUE.

Conscious virtue is the only foundation of all happiness, for riches, power, rank or whatever, in the common acceptance of the world, is supposed to constitute happiness will never quiet, much less cure, the inward pangs of guilt.—Lord Chesterfield.

"I have hopes that they won't be able to stand the workmen hanging around all day," I confessed, somewhat guiltily.

"Women in the party?"
"Two I believe. Both married and qualified to express opinions."

"They will be sure to nose me out," she said ruefully. "Women are dreadful nosers."

"Don't worry," I said. "We'll get a lot of new padlocks for the doors downstairs, and you'll be as safe as can be if you'll only keep quiet."

"But I don't see why I should be made to mope here all day and all night like a sick cat, holding my hand over Rosemary's mouth when she wants to cry and muzzling poor Jinko so that he—"

"My dear countess," I interrupted sternly, "you should not forget that these other guests of mine are invited here."

"But I was here first," she argued. "It is most unkind."

"I believe you said yesterday that you are in the habit of having your own way," she nodded her head.

"Well, I am afraid I'll have to come down from your high horse—at least temporarily."

"Oh, I see! You mean to be very firm and domineering with me?"

"You must try to see things from my point of view."

"Please don't say that," she flared. "I'm so tired of hearing those words. For the last three years I've been commanded to see things from some one else's point of view, and I'm sick of the expression."

"For heaven's sake don't put me in the same boat with your husband!"

She regarded me somewhat frigidly for a moment longer, and then a slow, winking smile crept into her eyes.

"I shan't," she promised and laughed outright. "Do forgive me, Mr. Smart. I'll try to be nice and sensible, and I will be as still as a mouse all the time they're here. But you must promise to come up every day and give me the gossip."

We fell into a discussion of present and future needs; of ways and means for keeping my friends utterly in the dark concerning her presence in the abandoned east wing.

"I've been trying to recall all of the notable marriages we had in New York three years ago," said I, after she had most encouragingly reduced me to a state of submission in the matter of three or four moot questions that came up for settlement. "You don't seem to fit in with any of the international affairs I can bring to mind."

"You promised you wouldn't bother about that, Mr. Smart," she said severely.

"Of course you were married in New York?"

"In a very nice church just off Fifth avenue, if that will help you any," she said. "The usual crowd inside the church and the usual mob outside all fighting for a glimpse of me in my wedding shroud and for a chance to see a real Hungarian nobleman."

It really was a very magnificent wedding, Mr. Smart. She seemed to be unduly proud of the spectacular sacrifice.

A knitted brow revealed the abashed condition of my brain. I was thinking very intently, not to say remotely.

"Don't you read the newspapers?" she cried impatiently. She actually resented my ignorance.

"Religiously," I said, stung to revolt. "But I make it a point never to read the criminal news."

"Criminal news?" she gasped. "What do you mean?"

"It is merely my way of saying that I put marriages of that character in the category of crime."

"Oh!" she cried, staring at me with unbelieving eyes.

"Every time a sweet, lovely American girl is delivered into the hands of a foreign brawler who happens to possess a life that needs living I call the transaction a crime. You do not love this philanthropic count, did he cure a thing for you. You were too young in the ways of the world to have any feeling for him, and he was too old to have any for you. The whole hateful business therefore involved in itself into a case of give and take—and he took everything. He took you and your father's millions and now you are both back where you began. Some one deliberately committed a crime, and as it wasn't you or the count, who saved his legitimate life, it must have been the person who planned the conspiracy. I take it, of course, that the whole affair was arranged behind your back, so to speak."

Her face was quite pale. Her eyes did not leave mine during the long and crazy drive, on which I was already beginning to feel heavily ashamed and there was a dark, ominous threat in them that should have warned me.

She arose from her chair. It seemed to me she was taller than before.

"If nothing else came out of this transaction," she said levelly, "at least a certain amount of dignity was acquired. I may remember that I am no longer the unscrupulous girl you so gracefully describe. 'I am a woman, Mr. Smart.'"

"True," said I, senselessly dogged. "a woman with the power to think for herself. That is my point. If the same situation arose at your present age I fancy you'd be able to select a husband without assistance, and I venture to say you wouldn't pick up the first disreputable nobleman that came your way. No, my dear countess, you were not to blame. You thought, as your parents did, that marriage with a count would make a real countess of you. What rot! You are a simple, lovable American girl, and that's all there ever can be to it. To the end of your days you will be an American."

We were both standing now. She was still measuring me with somewhat incredulous eyes, rather more tolerant than resentful.

"Do you expect me to agree with you, Mr. Smart?" she asked.

"I do," said I promptly. "You of all people should be able to testify that my views are absolutely right."

"They are right," she said simply. "Still you are pretty much of a brute to haunt me with them."

"I most sincerely crave your pardon if it isn't too late," I cried, abject once more. (I don't know what gets into me once in a while.)

"Please, please don't say anything more about it. I daresay you've done me a lot of good. Perhaps I shall see things a little more clearly. To be perfectly honest with you, I went into this marriage with my eyes wide open, but I was only one fool among many. Dozens of other girls in my set were crazy to marry him. I haven't told you that he is extremely good looking. And he was—was adorable in those days."

"Stranger things have happened than that you should patch up your difficulties and go back to live with your husband."

She uttered a little cry of revulsion.

"How dare you suggest such a thing! How dare you speak to me in that way! You—I ought to order you out of this room and never—never!"

My luminous smile checked the outburst.

"Splendid!" I cried. "You convince me that it can never happen."

"You spoke of him as my husband," she said, going back to my remark.

"He is not my husband. Please he good enough to remember that."

"It will be easy, I assure you. May I therefore venture the hope that if you ever decide to marry again you'll give some deserving American a chance to make you his queen?"

"I shall never marry, Mr. Smart," she said with decision. "Never, never again will I get into a mess that is so hard to get out of. I can say this to you because I've heard you are a bachelor. You can't take offense."

"I fondly hope to die a bachelor," said I with humility.

"God bless you!" she cried, bursting into a merry laugh, and I knew that a truce had been declared for the time being at least. "And now let us talk sense. Have you carefully considered the consequences if you are found out, Mr. Smart?"

"Found out?"

"If you are caught shielding a fugitive from justice. It occurred to me last night that the safest thing for you to do, Mr. Smart, is to—get out yourself."

"I stated. She went on hurriedly. "Can't you go away for a month's visit or—"

"Well, upon my soul!" I gasped. "Would you turn me out of my own house? This beats anything I've—"

"I was only thinking of your peace of mind and your—your safety," she cried unhappily. "Truly, truly I was."

"Well, I prefer to stay here and do what little I can to shield you and Rosemary," said I sullenly.

"I'll not say anything horrid again, Mr. Smart," she said quite meekly. (I shook my head and the countess shrank with laughter. It wouldn't have been so bad if the nurse had known her place. If there is one thing in this world that I hate with fervor it is an ill-mannered, poorly trained servant. A grinning nursemaid is the worst of all.

"Ha, ha!" I laughed bravely. "She—she evidently thinks I look like the count. He is very handsome, you say."

"Oh, that isn't it!" cried the countess, taking Rosemary in her arms and directing me to a spot on her rosy cheek. "Kiss right there, Mr. Smart. There! Wasn't it a nice kiss, honey, isn't it? If you are a very, very nice little girl the kind gentleman will kiss you on the other cheek some day. She calls every man she meets a—du," explained the radiant young mother.

"Oh," said I, rather crestfallen.

"Would you like to hold her, Mr. Smart?" She was a darling to hold.

"No—no, thank you," I cried, backing off.

"Oh, you will come to it, never fear," she said gaily as she restored Rosemary to the nurse's arms. "Won't be, Blake?"

"He will, my lady," said Blake with conviction. "I noticed this time that Blake's smile wasn't half bad."

At dinner that evening I asked Poop-eydyke point blank if he could call to mind a marriage in New York society that might in the principals in this puzzling case.

"I'm sorry, sir, but—ton I can't do it. I promised her this morning I wouldn't let her be dragged out of me with nothing long."

who suffered; now I heard her cry out against the husband that had hurt her so pitilessly. I turned my head away, vastly moved. Presently she moved over to the window. A covert glance revealed her standing there, looking not down at the Danube that seemed so far away, but up at the hazy sky that seemed so near.

The sound of dry, suppressed sobbing came to my ears. It was too much for me. I stealthily quit my position by the mantelpiece and slipped toward the door, bent on leaving her alone. Halfway there I hesitated, stopped and then deliberately returned to the fireplace, where I noisily shuffled a fresh supply of coals into the grate.

It would be bearable, even unmanly, to leave her without letting her know that I was heartily ashamed of myself and completely in sympathy with her. Wisely, however, I resolved to let her have her cry out. Some one a great deal more farseeing than I let the world into a most important secret when he advised me to take that course when in doubt.

For a long while I waited for her to regain control of herself, rather dreading the apology she would feel called upon to make for her abrupt reversion to the first principles of her sex. The sobbing ceased entirely. I experienced the sharp joy of relaxation. Her dainty lace handkerchief found employment. First she would dab it cautiously in one eye, then the other, after which she would scrupulously wipe her face with most extraordinary interest. At least a dozen times she repeated this puzzling operation. What in the world was she looking for? To this day that strange, all-peeping on her part remains a mystery to me.

She turned swiftly upon me and heckoned with her little forefinger. Greatly concerned, I sprang toward her. Was she preparing to swoon? What in heaven's name was I to do? She took it into her pretty head to do such a thing as that?

"Look!" she cried, pointing upward through the window. "Isn't she lovely?"

I stopped short in my tracks and stared at her in blank amazement. What a stuporizing creature she was! She beckoned again impatiently. I obeyed with alacrity. Obtaining a rather clear view of her eyes, I was considerably surprised to find no trace of departed tears. Her cheeks were as smooth and creamy white as it had been before the deluge. Her eyelids were dry and orderly, and her nose had not been blown once to my recollection. Truly, it was a marvelous recovery. I still wonder.

The cause of her excitement was visible at a glance. A trim nursemaid stood in the small gallery which circled the top of the turret, just above and to the right of us. She held in her arms the pink-headed, pink-coated Rosemary, made snug against the chilly winds of her lofty parade ground.

Catching the nurse's eye, she signaled for her to bring the child down to us. Rosemary took to me at once. A most embarrassing thing happened. As she came she held out her chubby arms and shouted "Ma-da!" at the top of her hurricane lungs.

I dashed, and the countess shrieked with laughter. It wouldn't have been so bad if the nurse had known her place. If there is one thing in this world that I hate with fervor it is an ill-mannered, poorly trained servant. A grinning nursemaid is the worst of all.

"Ha, ha!" I laughed bravely. "She—she evidently thinks I look like the count. He is very handsome, you say."

TURNING A NEW LEAF

By De Lysie Ferree Cass

ROGER FEATHERSTONE

rose late on New Year's morning with the heaviest suggestion of a headache. That was the aftermath of the previous night's celebration, memorabilia of which were scattered all about the apartment in a weirdly incongruous way. Roger's coat was still brightly speckled with red, yellow and blue confetti; there was a battered tin horn protruding from one pocket, and a particolored fool's cap made of tissue paper was set rakishly askew on the bronze bust of Beethoven on the piano.

In the hazy-recalled grotesquerie of last night's homecoming, Roger had denuded himself progressively, beginning with his shoes at the door, his hat and waistcoat beside the dresser; trousers and linen at the foot of the bed and, last of all, his scarf tied in a beautifully neat bow beneath the nob of the headpost.

Roger sat up regarding all this whimsically for some time and wondering dully how it is that morning daylight always imparts such a haggard aspect to the rosy visions of the night before. He yawned and stretched prodigiously; then made a bound for the washbasin and lathered his head in gratefully cold and refreshing water from the tap.

"Heigh-ho! New Year's morning and my fortieth birthday all in one! The good Lord knows that I don't feel that old, but these periodic 'parties' sure are beginning to pall upon me. If I were to do the conventional thing now, I'd begin the new year by making some amazingly moral resolution and then—But, after all, why not? I'll make a resolution and not break it, either! I'm forty years old today and as comfortable a bachelor as any I know. Hereby I do solemnly avow a placid life of celibacy. No wedding bells for me!"

Roger dressed leisurely, not a little pleased with the positive formulation of the idea that really had been in the back of his head for months past. He liked and admired girls, of course—what real man doesn't? But it was in a detached impersonal sort of way. He enjoyed their chatty conversations as mentally respite after weighty business conferences at the office all day long; he liked vivacious femininity across the table when he dined out in the evening. But as for actually burdening himself with one woman for life—as for voluntarily domesticating himself, eachwing the good fellows at the club, and as for systematizing his life into a humdrum routine—no, no! not for Roger Featherstone!

Ah! there went the telephone bell! His sister Madge undoubtedly—Madge who had married Phil Barnes and taken out of the merry whirl of things as jolly a chap as ever—

"Hello! hello! Yes, this is Roger talking. Oh, I thought it might be you."

Roger sat up.

Greetings in China.

The Chinese salutation when friends meet consists in clasping the left hand with the right and waving it up and down, at the same time bowing deeply, or, if unusual respect is wished to be evinced, the Chinaman bows as low as possible, swinging his clasped hands between his legs backward and forward.

What to Do When Backache Comes On

"Foley Kidney Pills have done me more good than $150.00 worth of other medicine." Chas. N. Fox, Hiram, N. Y.

When backache comes on and it seems as if you can't stand the pain and pressure across the small of your back, hurry to your drugstore and get relief through a box of Foley Kidney Pills. They will stop the cause of that pain very quickly. Repair the sluggish kidneys to regular action, enable them to throw the poisons out of the blood. They will rid you of pain and rheumatism for you, quiet your nerves, stop your backache, and limber up your aching joints and sore muscles.

Frank W. Sherman, Locoma, N. Y., writes: "I suffered with kidney trouble, had a tired feeling in my back, did not have any ambition and felt all tired out. I used Foley Kidney Pills and in a few days began to feel better, and now I have entirely recovered."

Sold Everywhere

ais. why, no-o-o! I've no particular appointment for tonight. For dinner at your house? Yes, I'll come, thank you. Eh? You don't say? Betty Hurling going to be there with you, too? Well, well, of course I remember her! We used to be sweethearts back in kid days. When did she get back in town? Must be four or five years since we've met. All right, I'll be over."

Roger sighed as he hung up the receiver; then grinned.

"Tonight will be a good time to tell them about my New Year's resolution."

CONVICT ROAD WORK IN STATES

Recent Reports All Go to Show Success of System.

FINE HIGHWAYS BUILT.

Continuance of Convict Road Work in Most of the States Will Depend on Its Economic Value—This Is Being Proved by What Has Been Done in Several States.

Does convict road work pay? The continuance of the work in most of the states depends on its economic value. The national committee on prisons and prison labor has been investigating this side of the convict road question and has received an encouraging report from A. D. Williams, chief road engineer of the state of West Virginia.

The report covers the work at Dana, Kanawha county, and has been conducted under the supervision of M. P. Walsh for a period of ten months, half of which was through the winter. From November, 1914, to June, 1915, the measured quantities on the Malden road constructed by the convicts from the Dana camp were:

207 cubic yards rubble masonry in cement.
185 cubic yards rubble masonry in dry.
245 cubic yards re-enforced concrete.
22 linear feet twenty-four re-enforced vitrified pipe.
23 linear feet eighteen re-enforced vitrified pipe.
408 linear feet twelve re-enforced vitrified pipe.
85 cubic yards foundation excavation.
2,386 cubic yards unclassified excavation.

The total cost of this work amounted to $11,589.92, while the lowest of four bids received from private contractors for this same work amounted to $15,118.05, or $3,528.13 more than the work actually cost when constructed by the prisoners. Twenty-five per cent of the total cost of the work was, therefore, saved by the use of the prisoners.

The success in this work is pointed out by the committee to be due to the fact that the men in charge were efficient and desirous of success, and also had the welfare of the prisoners at heart, so that they secured interest and good will in the work.

A hundred and nineteen miles of road were completed during 1911 by Montana state prisoners, many miles of which were through rough and hilly country where the work was very difficult. Warden Conley of the state's prison says that the prison labor is worth $3 a day to the state, as it equals free labor, which receives that wage. No wage is paid the prisoner, however, and his total cost to the state is only 60 cents per day. For this reason the warden argues that the state allow him a wage from its profits, which would in many cases be used to support a prisoner's dependent family.

Colorado Springs and Canyon City highway and the Ute pass section of the Pike's peak ocean to ocean road, recently completed by Colorado's system of convict labor, are two of the most perfect mountain roads in the United States.

The Ute pass road follows the ancient trail of the Indians across the Rocky mountains. In the last few years that part of it between Colorado Springs and Cascade has been entirely reconstructed by convicts.

Under the Colorado system the convict has ten days taken off his sentence for each month of labor on the roads. This is in addition to the usual reduction for good behavior.

Thomas J. Tynan, warden of the state penitentiary, under whose supervision the work of the last three years has been done, estimates that in the next ten years 5,000 miles of the best roads will be constructed at a cost of less than $500,000.

He says 1,000 men have been used in the road work in the last three years at a cost to the state of 25 cents a day for each man. The men go about their work unguarded, and less than 1 per cent have violated their pledges and made successful escapes.

Thirty states at the beginning of the present year had on their statute books laws providing for the employment of state prisoners in road building.

GEOLOGIC PERIODS.

Stories of Time Told by Fossilized Plants and Animals.

Scientists hesitate to estimate geological time in terms of years. Such estimates have, however, been made, and one published by Professor Charles Schuchert in 1910 states that about 12,000,000 years have elapsed since the close of the carboniferous age, an age, as the name suggests, in which great deposits of carbon, in coal, were being formed in many parts of the world. This age has been divided by geologists into the Mississippian, Pennsylvanian and Permian epochs, of which the Mississippian is the oldest and the Permian the youngest. The Pennsylvanian epoch alone is estimated by Schuchert to have covered 2,160,000 years, and mineral life is supposed to have existed on the earth for over 14,000,000 years before that time.

Geologic periods are recognized primarily by the animals and plants that lived in them, so that the study of fossils plays a very real and important part in the progress of geologic knowledge.

Rocks of carboniferous age, as shown by their fossils, have a wide distribution in the United States, and they are apt to abound in these remains of plant and animal life. The fossil shells which are found in them, however, may vary greatly from point to point, because the animals they represent lived in different periods of geologic time or in different regions in the carboniferous ocean.—Argonaut.

After the War—What?

Sherman said "War is hell." He was mistaken. War is worse than hell. Hell is the place where, after the judgment day, the wicked are to be punished according to what they deserve. But in war the innocent are punished and the instigators of the bloody carnage go unpunished. War will never cease as long as men are unregenerate and the nations glorify war by putting the laurel wreath on the brows of those who send shot and shell crashing through the bodies of men.

Men are horrified at the disregard of international law and treaty obligations by the belligerent powers engaged in the present war. But the necessities of war recognize no law, either human or divine, as too sacred to break. It is utterly folly for men to think that men frenzied by the spirit and exigencies of war will respect law, justice or humanity. War is entirely outside of God's purpose and is not amenable to any law or obligation.

Terrible as is the present war in its destruction of human life and its disregard of the restraints of law and justice, yet this war is as nothing in comparison to the significant and terrible things that will immediately follow the present conflict. New and startling developments will come quickly. Men everywhere will be ready to condemn the old regime as a total failure and unfit to rule humanity. Remedies of all kinds will be suggested to avert future wars and to usher in a reign of universal and lasting peace. All kinds of extensive religious combinations will be effected in order to guide the ship of state safely over the turbulent political seas. Attempts will be made to have the voice of the church dictate legislation and have the civil officers submit to the decrees of the church, and regard its pronouncements as an equivalent to a "Thus saith the Lord."

They will demand righteousness by law, God and Christianity legally recognized in the fundamental law of the land, a standard of religion set up for all men by the state, and Sunday laws universally enforced irrespective of individual faith or conscience in the matter. All these things will follow in quick succession as proposed remedies and the authority of the church will be exalted above the state.

History repeats itself with unending accuracy. When the Roman government went to pieces after the days of Constantine the church took advantage of the situation and placed herself in the forefront, making the civil officers subservient to her decrees. Her reign, which was at first welcomed, proved to be the bane and wreck and ruin of civilization for centuries. No greater calamity could befall our republic than for it to repudiate its constitutional guarantees of individual freedom in religious matters and its strict adherence to purely civic functions. Unless our rulers maintain an uncompromising loyalty to the fundamental principles upon which our government was founded, ed, a worse catastrophe will befall our nation at the conclusion of the present war than that which the war itself will bring to the nations of Europe. The losses of war are forgotten in a few days, but the subjection of the civil power to the spiritual powers will inaugurate a train of evils which two millenniums could not efface. Omens of the coming storm and upheaval are clearly visible in the religious, political and social worlds.

Very sincerely yours,
Thos. DeMouplod,
Of the Seventh Day Adventist Church.

School Notes

Atwood School

The heavy snow fall the first of last week had no effect upon our attendance, which has been excellent.

Teachers and pupils have spent a great deal of time during the last two weeks in preparing for Christmas services.

In history the 8th grade have finished their test to the Civil War. The 7th grade are studying Revolutionary war. When the study of the war is finished, the 7th grade will discontinue the study of history until they have reached the 8th grade.

The following pupils of grammar grades were neither absent or tardy for the month ending December 24. Jennie Van Der Heide, Effie Fyn, Andrew Petter, Henry Essenburg, Jennie Fyn, Sieblo VanDerHeide, Jake Essenburg. The percentage of attendance for the month was 93%.

Primary Notes

The primary grades have been making Christmas posters on this month.

Fern Green of Central Lake spent a few days with her sister in Atwood.

Nellie Hastings, Lewis Essenburg, Harmje Essenburg, Ralph VanHouten, Thelma Klooster were neither absent or tardy during the month of December.

The Atwood school held their Christmas exercises in the hall Thursday evening. A large crowd attended and all seemed to enjoy the exercises and the tree.

The 8th grade has finished the U. S. Civil Government. They will take up the Civil Government of the state, at the beginning of the year. We will begin with the school district as a miniature republic, taking the township, county and state in their order of importance and finally winding up with a review of U. S. Government.

Holiness Convention.

The third annual Interdenominational Holiness Convention of the Northern Michigan Holiness Camp Meeting Association will be held in the Apostolic Holiness Church, at Ellsworth, January 4th to 9th. Evangelist Edwin E. Wood of Lansing will be the leading preacher.

This convention stands for the whole Bible from Genesis the first chapter and first verse to Revelation the last chapter and last verse. Come, and bring your friends with you.

SLIPPING MOTOR GEARS.

Refusal of Wheels to Stay in Mesh Due to Several Causes.

Occasionally one or other of the indirect gears is prone to slip out of engagement when the car is hill climbing. The natural tendency of the driver is to put the gear into mesh again after a momentary jolt at the clutch, and he generally makes a very bad gear scraping job of it. However, the point to urge is that when any one put of gears refuses to stop in mesh the matter should be looked into at once, because if it is allowed to continue the teeth very soon become more or less tapered or wedge shaped, and there is no remedy except a new gear wheel, or possibly a pair of wheels. Of course the trouble can always be momentarily overcome by holding the gear lever in position while clanking a bill, but it is most awkward to have to devote one hand to this job.

As a rule slipping out of mesh begins through some dirt getting into the gear engaging mechanism in the box or just outside in those cases where the selector rods are not entirely laced. Generally the cause is quite simple, though a little bit of hard grease which has formed in the pocket behind a selector rod may give a lot of trouble before the cause is discovered. Sometimes, too, the trouble is entirely external; the floorboard may prevent the lever when in one of the speed notches from coming right back, or the seat cushion may foul the lever.

The first thing to do is to take up the floor boards and open the gear box to see whether the gears mesh properly or not, but it will almost certainly be found that when there is a tendency for a gear to jump out only half the width of the teeth is in engagement. Even if three-quarters of the width of the teeth slides into engagement it is not enough; a tendency to tapering is developed, and new gears will be needed.

Submarine Bells For Lifeboats.

Submarine signal bells as equipment for ship lifeboats are suggested by the experience of a lifeboat of the burned transatlantic steamer Columbian, says the Engineering News. This boat drifted for two weeks directly in the path of transatlantic liners, and her occupants saw several steamers, but were unable to signal them. There were fifteen men in the boat, and eleven died before rescue came. Had ships been equipped with submarine signal receiving apparatus and had the drifting lifeboat of the Columbian been equipped with a submarine bell it could have signaled passing steamers a long distance away. It is stated that the sound from a submarine bell rung by hand can be detected at a distance of several miles.

Their Resolutions.

They were young as April as they pressed close to a window full of wonderful confectios.

"What had habits are you going to give up this New Year?" he asked.

"You," she answered briefly; "what had habits are you going to give up?"

"Lettag you have your own way," he responded firmly, "so our engagement stands."

"Very well, then, go in and buy me that heart-shaped box of candy." And both New Year resolutions went the way of their kind.

After Christmas Bargains

There are many goods that were left over from the holiday trade which we are going to Close Out at One-half Price

We would rather sell them at a sacrifice price than to carry them over for another season. Perhaps you will need some other article that will go nicely with those you received Christmas. You will find it here.

Special prices on TOYS will aid you in replacing some of those the boy has broken by this time.

Ladies' and Children's Coats DRESS SKIRTS

We still have a good assortment of Ladies' and Children's Coats which we are going to dispose of at prices that are amazingly low. Come in now and select the one you want. Keep warm and dress well at a small cost.

Dress Skirts that are beauties and ones that will gladden the heart of anyone who sees them, will be reduced in price.

Atwood
The saddest words
Of tongue or pen,
I'll pay you, but I don't know when.
A happy New Year.
Xmas spirits all of 1916.
Born, to Mr. and Mrs. Minor Heeres, on Friday, December, 24, a baby boy.
Congratulations.
Several Atwoodites attended the Christmas exercises at Norwood on Friday evening.
If your readers believe it is more blessed to give than to receive, now is a good time to try it out.

Editors of all papers ought to give a little extra on Xmas. Show an Xmas spirit. It is a "spurt" in the right direction.

It is expected that several prospective buyers for farmland living near the city of Saginaw will be here in February, 1916, to look for new farm homes.

Many have enjoyed Christmas just as it ought to be, presents in abundance thanks to the parcel post. Let us have the Christmas spirit, New Year's 1916, then it will be just as good and bright as the holidays.

Echo, District No. 4

A large crowd attended the program which was very successfully given.

Beale Martin entered school Thursday, after more than a week's absence.
Miss Anna Murray of John McMillan assisted in decorating the schoolhouse Thursday afternoon.

Ruth Carpenter left, Friday morning for her home in Ellsworth to spend her vacation of two weeks.

Most of last week was spent in practicing our program and decorating the room, for which green and red crepe paper and bells were used.

Rock Elm District

Mr. Flagg lost his horse recently.
Remember the prayer-meeting on Thursday evening of each week.

Proaching service next Sunday at 2
p. m. followed by the bible school.

On Friday morning of last week Mr.
Kenner's family left for Detroit, where he has secured employment.

The Christmas entertainment was held at the Grange hall Friday night.
The program was well rendered and all who attended spent a pleasant evening.

NEW YEAR "NEVER AGAINS"

Suggestions for Husbands, Wives and All Lovers, Married or Single,
That Are Timely.

If you haven't thought up any, here are a few timely suggestions:
For hubby: Never again to spend a moment out of the presence of the wife unaccompanied by a trustworthy guardian appointed by her, who will report faithfully all of your doings, even to the irregular gulper of an eyelash, or the drinking of soda instead of buttermilk.

Never again to be such a brute as to want to stay at home when this wife wishes to go out, or to wish to go out—by yourself—when wife desires you to stay at home in the bosom of your family.

Never again to growl, grumble or sneer, or pretend to be asleep when the wife pokes you in the back and asks you to walk with the baby in the middle of the night.

Never again to threaten to forbid tradespeople to allow the wife credit if she and the girls do not cease their extravagance—when the monthly bills come in.

Never again to forget to peek wife on the cheek upon leaving her in the morning and coming home at night, to tell her that her frightful new bonnet is a perfect gem, and that her "fourteen-year-old" short dress is altogether too old-looking for her youthful figure.

For wife: Never again to make biscuit for breakfast until you have tried them on your own digestion for a few weeks in the absence of the rest of the family.

Never again to notice pa exchange-ing glances with the pretty girl across the aisle all the way downtown.

Never again to keep the lights turned on when pa has been detained downtown "on business," in order to see what time he gets home, or to insist on his kissing you that you may smell his brost.

Never again to come to the table with hair in curlers and wearing a colored kimono.

Never again to subject pa to spells of lachrymose reproaches, telling him that he doesn't love you any more.

For lovers, married or single: Never to miss an opportunity to tell the dear old story over and over again.

Never to lose the coquettish elusiveness that makes lovers so delightful to each other.

Never again to spend the sweets of young love souls in cheap flirtations when there is such a world of real happiness at your command.

Never to become insensible to the delicious tremblings and flutterings of your own heart, or to become lax in all of those lovely attentions and giv-ings that help to keep a keen response a-thrill in the heart of the beloved.

Helps Some.

"Some folks say dat mere words don't count," said Uncle Ehon, "but de fact dat some folks think enough of you to say 'Happy New Year' to you helps some."

QUAINT SOLDIER CEREMONY

How Crack Scotch Regiment, the Sea-forth Highlanders, Ushers in the New Year.

The Seaforth Highlanders, one of Scotland's crack regiments now at the front, have one of the most peculiar New Year's eve customs of the whole British army. The ceremony is picturesque and imposing.

On the night of Hogmanay, at about 10:30 o'clock, the regiment assembles in the barracks square. A few minutes later the oldest soldier in the battalion, dressed as a Druid, makes his appearance, to the accompaniment of a flourish of trumpets. Ascending the improvised throne, he calls on the veterans to show their uniforms and achievements of bygone times. To the music of the pipes and harp hand veteran after veteran, arrayed in the uniforms worn by the regiment at different periods, marches past and salutes the Druid. The Druid then teasts "The Seaforth Highlind-ers."

After a display of Highland dancing the alarm is sounded, and the second oldest soldier, arrayed as Father Time, approaches. The veterans then retreat, leaving their honors to be guarded by their successors, and Father Time expels the Druid.

At the last stroke of midnight a loud knock is heard at the gate and out rings the sentry's challenge:
"Halt! Who goes there?"

"The New Year!" comes back the answer.

"Advance, New Year, and give the countersign!" is the next command.

"Pass, New Year; nil's well!"

The gate is then opened and the youngest boy of the battalion enters, dressed as the high chief of ancient Rosa, to represent the New Year. The colonel shakes hands with the boy, while the band strikes up, "A Guid New Year to Ane and A'."

After the colonel's greeting to the battalion the national anthem is played and the men fall out.

The Old and the New.

Another year has joined his abad-owly fellows in the wide and voiceless desert of the past, where, from the eternal hour-glass forever fall the sands of time. Another year, with all its joy and grief, of birth and death, of failure and success, of love and hate. And now, the first day of the new o'erarches all. Standing between the hurried and the hazy, we cry,
"Farewell and hail!"—Robert G. Ingersoll.

NEW YEAR'S DAY IN CHINA

Occasion When Whole Country is Painted Red—Time When All Debts Must Be Settled.

New Year is the national payday in China. All accounts must be squared up at that time, and the man who can't raise money enough to pay his debts has to go into bankruptcy. The laws are such that the creditor can enter the debtor's house and take what he pleases if there is no settlement.
To prevent such action families club together and make all sorts of compromises to keep up the business reputation of the clan. New Year is a great day for the pawnbrokers; their shops are crowded with people who want to redeem their best clothes before the New Year. There are crowds, also, who want to pawn other things in order to get money to pay their debts. Pawnbrokers receive high rates of interest, in which they are protected by the government.

The Chinese paint the whole country red, figuratively speaking, on New Year's day, in mere senses than one.
Red is the color which with them denotes good luck and prosperity, and all the New Year cards and invitations are on paper of that color. Every child gets its New Year's present wrapped in red paper, and red inscriptions are pasted over the doors of the houses. These inscriptions bear characters praying for good fortune, wealth and happiness, and they are posted on each side of the outer door of the houses. New pictures of Chinese generals are put on the front doors and the houses are scoured and made clean.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

When the World's All New.

It is the same, old world that we greeted on New Year's morning. But somehow it looked so different. The invisible dividing line between last year and this has made possible a new angle of vision. The grip of old passions seems to have lost its hold and a new purpose, partly old, partly new, throbs for recognition. A gentleness appears in faces thought to be hard and cynical. Happiness sparkles in the eyes of sad and lonely folk. A sort of introduction is needed to oneself. For the dawn of the new year makes possible a fresh attack on the age-worn problems, another attempt to produce the best instead of the good, and a new walk down by-ways of human experience where one may be a good Samaritan with no eye but his to see and understand. The world is all new on New Year's morning—my world, your world, our world—to make over for the Kingdom.—Ralph Welles Keeler.

FARMERS QUERY COLUMN

Mail All Questions to This Office or to
H. L. Barham, Ironton, Michigan

Question—I have been told that tilling will pay for itself in one season. Is this true?

Answer—Personally, I hardly think that the benefits of tile draining would be so great as to pay the cost of installation in one season, but this would depend on several variable factors, such as cost of labor, nature of the soil, kind of crop, etc. There are so many advantages from tile drainage, however, that a brief statement of a few of them will serve to show that the benefits are, indeed, very great:

1. Drainage increases room for the growth of plant roots.
2. It makes more water available.
3. It makes soil warmer.
4. It improves aeration, or circulation of soil air.
5. It improves the physical condition of heavy soils.
6. It increases the action of useful soil bacteria.
7. It permits early tillage of soil.
8. It lessens erosion or surface washing.
9. It helps to prevent heaving of heavy soils.
10. It tends to make the growth of crops uniform over fields.

Space does not permit of a full discussion of each of these points, but specific questions regarding them will be dealt with in detail.

Question—What is meant by the term "chop" as used by writers in farm papers?

Answer—The terms "corn meal," "chop" and "corn chop" as used by stockmen refer to the entire ground grain. Corn meal for human food is the same with the hulls of the kernels removed by bolting.

Question—What is the value of skim milk for feeding pigs? For calves?

Answer—Skim milk has practically the same value for both pigs and calves. (Utah Bul. 57.) Fed alone, skim milk does not prove an economical feed for pigs, but when fed with some starchy grain like corn it is one of the most valuable of feeds. The ratio of milk to corn, however, should not be greater than three to one to get the most profitable returns. With corn at 80 cents a bushel, as at present, and milk and corn fed in the proportion of three to one, the milk is worth about 45 cents per hundredweight and decreases in value as the relative quantity of milk fed increases. The average value for all the trials reported by Henry is 22 cents per hundredweight. The money value of skim milk per hundred pounds can be determined approximately by use of the rule proposed by Hoard: "If fed alone, multiply the market price of live hogs in cents per pound by five, and if milk is fed with corn, multiply by six."

TONNAGE OF A VESSEL.

Just What It Is and the Methods by Which It Is Measured.

To find the tonnage or displacement of a ship is rather puzzling. The tonnage of a ship is the measure of its cubical or carrying capacity expressed in tons. At the present time there are four methods in use of expressing the tonnage of a ship, known respectively as the gross tonnage, the net register tonnage, the deadweight tonnage and the displacement tonnage.

In calculating the gross tonnage the whole interior capacity of the ship below the tonnage deck is found, including that of all covered in spaces on deck used for stowage, and the result in cubic feet is divided by 100.

The net register tonnage is the gross tonnage minus all the spaces used for the accommodation of the crew and for the stowage of the working parts of the ship. It is on the net register tonnage that almost invariably dues are paid.

The deadweight tonnage is the measure of the exact amount of cargo that a ship can carry without sinking too deep in the water.

The displacement tonnage is the space occupied by the ship in the water. The amount of water displaced by a ship is, of course, equal in weight to the ship and all it contains. As one ton is equal to thirty-five cubic feet of water, the displacement tonnage is found by dividing the number of cubic feet of water displaced by thirty-five when the ship is immersed up to its draft or load line—London Standard.

That Depends.
Faddist—Don't you think skipper the rope is a highly dangerous practice?

Lawyer—Not always. I'm trying to have it put in practice for a client of mine now.—Baltimore American.

FARMERS HELP TO SAVE QUAIL

By Feeding and Caring for Them During Cold Winter Months.

State Game Department Willing to Pay for Grain Feed—Farmers Urged to Help.

Farmers of Northern Michigan as well as all other parts of the state are asked by the state game department to aid this winter in the care of the quail in an effort to keep these fine game birds from starving and freezing to death.

Deputy Game Warden Tom Bryant of Pellston was a caller at the Courier office on Friday of last week and stated that he had been spending some time visiting farmers in Emmett, Antrim and Charlevoix counties, and in every instance where there are any quail on the farm the farmer has been feeding and caring for them all winter, and for several winters for that matter.

He is greatly pleased with the attitude of the farmers in caring for the quail. They realize the great value the bobwhites are in devouring the seed from noxious weeds and grasses, thus saving them an amount hard to estimate. The quail are the farmers' friends and the man who gives a little time and grain during the winter not only saves the birds from starvation, but keeps with him the best little destroyers of weeds the farmers tried hard each year to get rid of.

The state game department wants the farmers to keep up this good work and thought to push it along by offering to pay them for the grain, but the department is finding out that the farmers have been giving them grain for a long time without even a thought of ever being paid in money for it.

The following letter explains in detail the willingness of the game department to co-operate with the farmer:

Believing that Bob White's future in Michigan depends largely on the active protection and care extended by the game warden's department and the friendly co-operation of the farmer and sportsman, Commissioner Oates directs me to write you and all other deputies located in territory where quail and prairie chickens exist requesting that special attention be given to the safeguarding of these birds from the destructive effects of the deep snows and intense cold weather.

"The campaign to save these birds should be actively taken up at once and you are requested to interview as many farmers as possible at their home and in towns and villages of your district on market days, with a view of enlisting their co-operation in this work."

"We believe that the average Michigan farmer will gladly give so much of his time and sufficient suitable grain food as is necessary to save such coveys of quail or prairie chicken as may be found about his farm buildings or on his premises, during the winter months. If in carrying out this work you find conditions that in your judgment warrant the purchase of wheat screenings, rape, vetch seed or other suitable food such claims will be allowed and paid by this department."

"All claims for grain or seed purchased or furnished for feeding quail or other game birds in your district must be approved by you and we urge you to see to it that we get value received for all money expended in this work of saving these cheerful friends of the farmer, in Michigan."

Sincerely yours,
David R. Jones,
Special Assistant.

TWO FIRES IN ONE NIGHT

Lantern Sets Bed Clothing Afire Twice During Night—Small Damage

A small fire occurred Thursday evening at the Elsworth O'dell farm near Pleasant Valley. The two O'dell boys took a lantern upstairs to bed with them, going to sleep, leaving the lantern lighted. They were awakened by smoke, and found the bedding on fire. This was put out and every one returned to bed.

Mrs. O'dell became alarmed about twelve o'clock and going up stairs to see if the boys were alright, again found the bed in flames. The loss consisted only of bedding.

Stereopticon Lecture.

Thursday evening, January 6, commencing at 8:00 p. m. the Stereopticon lecture, "The Indian Nation" will be given in the Auditorium of the Baptist church. No charges for admission, but a silver offering will be taken at the close of the lecture. Come everybody.

CHECKS MUST BE CERTIFIED

Secretary of State Refuses to Accept Responsibility of Ordinary Paper for Auto License Tags.

Charlevoix and other state applicants for automobile licenses must see to it that the checks they send to the secretary of state are certified or they will not get their tags, according to information given out in Lansing dispatches to-day.

The stringent rule which the secretary of state drew regarding certified checks for automobile licenses is being broken daily by applicants, and not a single day passes that several uncertified checks are not sent back.

Already the secretary of state has taken in over $80,000 and some checks which were accepted at the start before the certified regulation was insisted upon are still on his hands unpaid. He will have to settle for them. This was caused by ultimatum that all checks must be certified.

Many bad checks have reached Mr. Vaughan's office since he became secretary of state last January. He has been compelled to make good on them, as the money or the equivalent thereof has to go into the state treasury. In some instances he has turned the bad checks over to the attorney-general and collections have been made on them.

"The public should understand our position," say Deputy Secretary of State Lusk. "We have to make good for bad ones, and the only way we can play absolutely safe is to insist upon all checks being certified. Many large corporations no doubt we be chagrined and hurt if their checks are sent back, but under the circumstances we cannot help it."

IF YOU HAVEN'T HAD THE GRIP

You're Not Up-to-Date—Seems to be a Popular Fad This Season.

Charlevoix People Who Have Not Sneezed and Shivered Have Their's Coming.

When the dreaded la grippe Gotteth you on the hip, And you think you're going to die; Keep a stiff upper lip, Don't give up the ship; You'll get well in the "Sweet Bye and Bye."

According to reports from various physicians, the grippé has an extensive foothold in Charlevoix. Although no cases have resulted seriously, there are many persons confined to their homes. Charlevoix is not unlike other cities in the state with respect to an epidemic of this disease, however. Despatches from Detroit state that there are fully 100,000 cases of the disease in that city and in many instances the patients have died. One physician stated Friday that he had visited twenty-eight cases of the epidemic and had many more to call on.

"La grippe is infectious," declared Dr. Armstrong, "and every precaution should be taken with it. The disease has a tendency to pneumonia, especially among older persons. People are advised to consult a physician if their cases get too severe."

"The epidemic which is now raging is the most severe for 15 years," declare local doctors. "Persons can easily come in contact with the germs, and one who is sneezing and coughing should be avoided as much as possible. There is no quarantine attempted with the grippé, but patients really should be isolated in order to check the disease."

Supreme Court Says No.

The supreme court has handed down an opinion that is far reaching, applying to nearly all if not every city and village in Michigan. Some time ago the city of Lansing purchased a bill of lumber from the Rikerd Lumber Company at that place. Jacob Ferle, one of the aldermen of that city, raised the question that the purchase was illegal, because Hiram W. Rikerd, chairman of the police and fire department, was connected with the lumber company. Recently the supreme court handed down an opinion that affirmed the decree of the Ingham circuit court, which declared the transaction illegal. This decision now will prevent the cities and villages from having any financial dealings with any concern in which any officer is interested.

It has been a source of wonderment to many as to how closely this law has been carried out in Northern Michigan cities.

COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE DISCLOSES SOME STARTLING FIGURES

Smash Talk of the Liquor Interests on "More Booze Consumed Under Prohibition Than Otherwise."—Uncle Sam Doesn't Lie.—Statistics Compiled By Crank on Figures.

The following article should be read by every man, woman and child who wishes enlightenment on the present conditions of the liquor traffic and the fight for prohibition. All the gross statements that more liquor is consumed under prohibition are shattered by the true figures issued by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and compiled into a more precise and emphatic form by a crank on figures. Considerable time was spent in making the following list of figures and even a child could quickly see the real truth that the liquor interests have tried to cover by every disreputable argument they could put forth.

Money talks with most evils, and few consider the real facts when blinded by the glitter of personal financial gain. Thus has the strong anti-prohibitionist organization closed the eyes of the weak ones who sought to be good fellows and let the tinkling of glasses and sparkle of highly-colored poisons pave the way to ruin. Even then has the liquor interest sought to be content? No. They are spending thousands of dollars on rank statements and placing glittering advertisements before the public trying to tear down every vestige of truth so they may continue the sale of spirituous liquors and malts.

The recently published report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue discloses some rather significant figures relative to the consumption of intoxicating liquors in the United States during the fiscal year of July 1st, 1914, to July 1st, 1915.

These figures of decreased consumption of both beer and whisky are the more startling when viewed in the light of the persistent statements of the liquor interests that local option and prohibition increases rather than decreases the consumption of intoxicating beverages.

This report shows a decrease in tax-paid distilled liquors of 14,983,333 gallons. This means that number of gallons of 100 proof spirits or spirits that contain one-half the volume of ethyl alcohol. This amount of whisky, for instance, reduced to 75 proof, which is about the average at which whisky is marketed, would make 19,478,332 9-10 gallons.

The report states that the decrease in tax-paid malt liquors or beer, etc., was 200,300,436 gallons. In order to reduce the above statement of fact to figures that will give more clearly an idea as to their magnitude, someone with a penchant for figures has made the following computations:

14,983,333 proof gallons put into the ordinary so-called quart bottles (which, as a matter of fact, contain one-fifth of a gallon) we would have 74,916,665 so-called quarts of proof whisky, or 97,391,660 bottles of 75 proof whisky. The latter number of bottles stood on each other would give us a column 97,391,660 feet, or 17,146.41 miles high, or if laid end to end would reach from New York to San Francisco five times and from New York to Grand Island, Nebraska, on the sixth lap.

Allowing one ounce of whisky per drink, we would have 2,493,363,896 drinks of whisky of 75 proof.

If ten drinks of this whisky would make one drunk, there would be 24,933,638 less drunks on account of the decreased sale of whisky alone during the time above mentioned.

If this whisky retailed at 10 cents per drink it would amount to $249,336,389.60.

The commissioner reports that the decrease in beer tax paid was 200,300,436 gallons, or 6,461,304 barrels, or 59,948,277 cases of so-called pints, three dozen bottles to the case. These bottles contain 2 of a pint, or 12 ounces instead of 16. This beer would fill 2,136,537,972 so-called pints. These bottles stood on each other would make a column 19,228,841,748 inches, or 1,602,403,479 feet, or 282,113.28 miles high. This would reach 14,113.28 miles beyond the moon, or, laid end to end, would reach 114 times around the earth.

If this beer sold for 10c. per bottle it would retail for $213,653,797.20.

If one gallon of beer would make a man drunk, there were 200,300,436 less beer jags last year than the year before. This added to the 24,933,638 whisky jags makes 225,234,069 less drunken men last year on account of the curtailed consumption of beer and whisky.

If this amount of beer was put into 1/2 barrel packages and stood on each other we would have a column 25,847,217 feet, or 4,550.21 miles high, or, laid end to end, would reach from Chicago to San Francisco and back and have 4.21 miles over.

59,948,277 cases piled on each other would make a pile 10,450 miles high.

If the above amount of whisky and beer would retail at $462,990,136.80 this amount would provide groceries for 1,286,253 families for one year, provided they spent $30 per month, or would clothe 9,259,802 children one year at $50 each.

This amount would buy 66,141,448 barrels of flour at $7 per barrel. These 66,141,448 barrels of flour would make 9,260,202,720 20-ounce loaves of bread.

This $462,990,136.80 would start a savings account of $4.62 each for every man, woman and child in the United States and leave a surplus of $990,136.80.

This $462,990,136.80 would build 9,259 miles, or almost three times across the continent, of single-track railroad costing $50,000 per mile.

This amount would build 92,598 houses costing $5,000 each.

This amount would pay the entire expense of Great Britain of the present war for almost a week at $75,000,000 per day.

Married Thursday.

Miss Mildred Sweet of East Jordan and Oscar R. Franzen of Chicago were married at the Congregational parsonage Thursday, December 30th, by Rev. C. E. Taggart. A reception was held at the home of the bride's mother, Mrs. D. E. Goodman, East Jordan, last Friday afternoon. Mr. and Mrs. Franzen left Tuesday for their new home in Chicago, where Mr. Franzen is engaged in the auto business.

EMMETT COUNTY POULTRY SHOW

E. J. Hiller Wins Several Prizes on Barred Rocks—Petoskey Made Big Showing.

The Emmett County Poultry Show held at Petoskey last week was a big success and while the Petoskey fanciers won the heaviest many outsiders carried away trophies. The Keycraft Farms had the best all around exhibition and won the Potchman's Department Store silver cup. The Morgan Curtis cup for the best cockerel was also won by the Keycraft farms, for the third time and now belongs to that firm.

George Ketchman of Harbor Springs had a fine lot of birds and won the Fred Glass Drug company silver cup for the best cock bird.

The first prize and best display of paste colored birds was won by W. W. Davis on Rhode Island Reds and the second prize by E. J. Hiller of this city on Barred Rocks. Mr. Hiller won other prizes with his Barred Rocks as follows: Cock first and third exhibition; hens, first and second, cockerel bred; cock-erel first and second exhibition; pullet first and second, cockerel bred; hens first and second, cockerel bred.

New Election Law.

The election laws passed by the last legislature will make some material changes in the methods of holding conventions and caucuses, which will go into effect in time to be available at the coming spring election. One of the most important is the law which provides that all conventions, caucuses and primaries must be held at least twenty days before election.

WE WILL STILL EXIST

Even if Some Cranky Unreasonable Subscriber Stops His Paper.

A short time ago a cranky sort of a fellow came into this office and stopped his paper because something was in it that didn't just suit his fancy. We have frequently met him on the street since, and it is amusing to note the look of surprise on the man's face that we are existence regardless of the fact that he stopped his paper.

Sometime and possibly not very long after this old man will pass from this life. His heart will be still forever. Neighbors and friends will follow his lifeless clay to the silent city and lay him to rest among his fathers. An obituary will be published in these columns telling what a kind father and good neighbor he was which the recording angel will overlook for charity's sake and in a short time he will be forgotten.

As he lies out there in the cold, cold graveyard, he will never know that the last kind word spoken of him was by the editor of that paper which he spitefully "stopped." Did you ever for a moment stop and think that your editor, whosever he may be, will write your obituary some day?

Married at Detroit.

Word was received here a few days ago of the marriage of Miss Ethel Brady and William Meyers, both former residents of this city, but now residing in Detroit, which took place at Detroit Christmas Day. Both Mr. and Mrs. Meyers are well and favorably known in this city, and their many friends extend congratulations.

GRANGES HOLD INSTALLATION

Nearly 100 Grangers Witness Ceremonies and Enjoy Big Feed.

Brother Gardner Gave an Interesting Report on Meeting of State Grange.

A joint installation of officers of the Marion Center and Charlevoix granges took place at Marion Center grange hall New Year's Day. During the forenoon members of both granges to the number of nearly 100 gathered at the hall. At noon an oyster and potluck dinner was served in the dining room, which was enjoyed as all grange dinners are.

Grange was called to order by W. M. Frank Smith and after the general routine of business the meeting was turned over to the installing officers, Ira Olney of South Arm Grange and Bro. Gardner of Pine Lake Grange, who, with the assistance of Sisters Jennie Burns and Gardner, proceeded to install the officers of both granges.

Brother Gardner was then called upon to give a report of the meeting of the State Grange, which he did in a very creditable manner, explaining in detail matters in reference to financial conditions, what is expected to be accomplished by the body during the coming year, and of all action taken in promoting the welfare and prosperity of subordinate granges throughout the state.

He paid a fine tribute to the citizens of Ann Arbor for the excellent treatment accorded the delegates and members of the State Grange at the annual convention recently held in that city.

This was followed by a few supplementary remarks by Brother Olney, delegate from the State Arm Grange, and Sister Jennie Black of Charlevoix Grange.

The joint installation and meeting was a thoroughly enjoyable event to all participating.

Smith Petitions Filed

Petitions to place the name William Alden Smith of Grand Rapids on the presidential ballot, for the Republican party have been filed with the state department at Lansing. The signatures for the petition have been obtained from Bay City.

New York reports stated that Roosevelt will ask Secretary of State Coleman C. Vaughan to disregard the petitions filed for his name on the Progressive ticket.

MISTAKE OF SMALL TOWN MERCHANTS

Failure of Many to Grow Found Due to Lack of Advertising.

Closer Attention to Publicity Would Be of Great Benefit to Many Dealers.

The greatest trouble in most small communities is that the merchants as a general rule are jealous of their competitors in the same town or neighborhood and think because a spasmodic insertion of a small ad. doesn't keep them and their clerks jumping to fill orders, it doesn't pay to advertise. And also they do not pay enough attention to this most important part of their business.

As a general rule, in his ad. writing, when he finally does decide to invest a few jitneys with the local paper, he waits until the last possible moment before getting the printer the copy and then scribbles only a few general remarks that the public already knows, such as, be it a grocery store, "We have sugar, lots of it," and signs his name, and the same way with the dry goods store, "We handle shirts and socks," and so on through the different lines of business. Get some pep into you and give the people the inducements that others are giving, and it will pay to advertise.

The sooner the merchants of any town where such conditions exist get to understand that getting up good readable ads., in an intelligent manner, of what they have to sell and what prices they want is as important as opening up their store in the morning the sooner they will learn that it is advertising that brings in the coin.

So many merchants and others who have goods to advertise say "Oh, I haven't time to write an ad.," but still you see no one in the store. Get busy, or you will be sorry some day to see your trade gradually slipping away from you, and no one's fault but your own. What would you say to a clerk who would tell you he hadn't time to do a certain important duty he had to perform? "Undoubtedly it would be 'Take time or get out!'"

Others say: "I don't have to advertise; everybody for miles around knows me." Sure they do, but if you don't get up and hustle, or "shake a leg," as is sometimes said, they will put you down as a has-been, and in these days of hustle you have to be up and going after what you want or someone will beat you to it.

If you haven't time or don't know how, why don't you and others in a like predicament get together and hire one who can and you will make advertising pay. This can be done at a very nominal cost.

What does it cost the large mail order houses to advertise and send catalogues into this county to get their goods before the people? There are, at a small estimate about 5,000 large catalogues sent into this county each year, not to say anything of the numerous smaller ones which we will not speak of. The 5,000 large ones cost on an average to place in the hands of the receiver—printing, postage, packing, etc.—about $1 each. This means $5,000 spent for printers' ink by a house hundreds of miles away. Do you think they would continue in business long if it did not pay? No; they got this amount back and much more and have a good profit on their books besides.

GIVE THEM GOOD CARE

A Little Attention Given to Stock and Horses Now Will Repay You.

A little special attention on the part of farmers and others having horses and other stock to care for will go a long way towards keeping them in good condition this winter when feed is scarce and high, was suggested by a man who likes animals and knows how to care for them. Fix up the stables as warm as you can, use a stable blanket if possible, see that they have plenty of good water, don't work or drive them any more than you have to and when you do feed them as well as you can, blanket them when left on the street, and be kind to them. Kindness always pays a big dividend, but never more than when used towards stock, and careful and gentle usage will go a long way towards having your stock come out in good shape in the spring.

SIGNS OF DANGER

That Should Be Heeded by Charlevoix People.

There's serious danger in neglecting any weakness of the kidneys. The warning that Nature gives should not be overlooked. If troubled by too frequent passage of the kidney secretions; burning or scalding; if the secretions are highly colored and contain sediment when left standing—if you have backache, too, with frequent headaches and dizziness, make up your mind that your kidneys are affected and begin using some reliable Kidney remedy. Deaths from kidney disease have increased in the United States alone, 72 per cent in last 20 years. The risk is great—you can't afford to delay. Charlevoix people recommend Doan's Kidney Pills. Can you ask for better proof of merit than the statement of this Charlevoix resident?

Mrs. R. M. McKeel, 214 Mason Street, Charlevoix, says: "I had been troubled for several months by kidney disease. My body bloated quite badly and I had a weak back and severe pains in my kidneys. My rest was broken at night. I finally got Doan's Kidney Pills at the Ivy Drug Store and they gave me relief in every way."

Price 50c. at all dealers. Don't simply ask for a kidney remedy—get Doan's Kidney Pills—the same that Mrs. McKeel had. Foster-Milburn Co., Props., Buffalo, N. Y.

ALCOHOL AS MOTOR FUEL.

Gives More Power When Used in Specially Designed Engines.

Experiments conducted by the United States government, as well as foreign governments, and independent laboratories, are conclusive in establishing the fact that any gasoline or kerosene engine on the American market can operate with alcohol as a fuel without any structural change whatsoever. But, since alcohol contains approximately 66 of the heating value of gasoline by weight, an engine adapted for the use of gasoline or kerosene requires about 1.8 times as much alcohol as gasoline per horsepower hour. This consumption, however, can be reduced by so altering the construction of the motor as to materially increase the compression, and by using a carburetor which will thoroughly vaporize the alcohol. An engine designed for gasoline or kerosene will give about 10 per cent more power when operated on alcohol provided the necessary modifications are made. An engine specially built for alcohol will give from 20 per cent to 30 per cent more power than is obtainable from a regular gasoline engine of the same size. Because of the increased efficiency obtainable from a standard size of engine using alcohol, the cost of propulsion per horsepower will be less than that of gasoline or kerosene engines of the same class.

Another important factor relative to the use of alcohol as a fuel is the decreased danger of stowage, as compared to gasoline. Alcohol is miscible with water in all proportions and its flame can be extinguished by water, while water too spreads a gasoline blaze, as well as its greater cleanliness and more pleasant odor. The exhaust from an alcohol engine is not offensive and to operate an alcohol engine less skill is required than in the case of a gasoline or kerosene engine, because an alcohol engine will run well under widely varying conditions of fuel mixture. That is, with a gasoline engine the proportion of gasoline vapor to air must be about one to fifteen in order to obtain the best economy and power, while with an alcohol engine any mixture of alcohol vapor and air over a very wide range will permit the engine to operate satisfactorily, although, of course, if the mixture is over rich fuel waste will result—but the power of the engine will not be seriously affected.

Furthermore, the deposit of carbon in an alcohol engine, if the proper grade of lubricating oil is used, is impossible, while gasoline and kerosene engines cannot be operated without having the interior parts become "sooty," with resultant loss of power. —Automobile Dealer and Repairer.

Durability of Wooden Piles.
Unprotected, the tops of white pine more than eighty years old were found perfectly sound and good when removed recently from the foundation of piers B and C, North river, New York, says Engineering Record. The tops of the piles, about six feet long above the high water level, were as sound and good as the submerged portions. These piles were located near the center of the pier, where the deck shielded them from sun and rain, and were in an open, well ventilated space not subject to rapid drying out by direct sunshine. The pier from which these piles were taken is one of the oldest that has been removed in New York, and in it, as in others, it is found that timber is durable under favorable conditions, although similar piles in the exterior rows of the foundation which are subject to more rapid drying out by direct sunshine, are liable to decay above high water level.

Fast Time in an Electric Roadster.
An electric roadster recently made a 167 mile run from Philadelphia to Washington, D. C., in eight hours and forty-seven minutes actual running time, says the Electrical World. On the preceding day the same car made the trip from Atlantic City to Philadelphia in two hours and eleven minutes. After an all night charge at Philadelphia the start for Washington was made at 4:50 in the morning. The average speed maintained on the trip was about nineteen miles an hour. It was necessary to make three stops on the road for charging the battery—at Wilmington and Belair, Del., and at Baltimore. The motorists, after making many detours en route, arrived in the capital city that night at 9:32 o'clock.

The Lowest Temperature.
Science assures us that there is a definite limit to the lowest conceivable temperature, and this may be placed with considerable accuracy at 450 degrees below zero on the Fahrenheit scale. It is held that at all temperatures above this "absolute zero" particles of matter, either solid or gaseous, are in a state of vibration, the more rapid vibrations corresponding to the greater degree of heat. All such vibrations would cease entirely at absolute zero and all gases would thenceforth be motionless.

Removing Carbon.
In cleaning the cylinders of a gas engine by removing them to scrape out the carbon deposit it is useful to remember that where the dimensions of the bore in particular, do not allow the hand to be inserted into the cylinders a piece of "card clothing" similar to the wire brush of a tire repairing outfit nailed on the end of a piece of wood will clean out crevices that a screwdriver never touches.

Hint to Auto Drivers.
When the small rubber cushion to the bottom of a tire valve cap becomes displaced in any way it is apt to depress the small core stem of the valve and allow a slow leak.

Paving Up Pavement.
The street car company of Cleveland has recently designed a novel pavement plover for the quick and economical breakup of paving antecedent to track work. The plover consists of a heavy steel casting of suitable shape for lifting the paving blocks and for cutting the tie rods at the same time. It is pulled by a service motorcar. Three men and the crew of the motorcar are all the personnel needed to operate the machine. This unique plover can remove 1,300 square feet of pavement in one minute. On another occasion the pavement in a stretch of track 2,000 feet long was removed in thirty-five minutes. The plover is used but once or twice a week, for on a town's work with it will give the street car company enough track to work on for eight or twelve days.—Electric Rail way Journal.

For the Family Medicine Chest

Green Bay, Wis., Mrs. Wm. F. Bubolz says: "I always use Foley's Honey and Tar for our children as it quickly breaks up their colds with no bad after effects, and they like to take it."

In this season of coughs, colds and croup, every family medicine chest should be supplied with a good cough medicine that can be relied upon when needed.

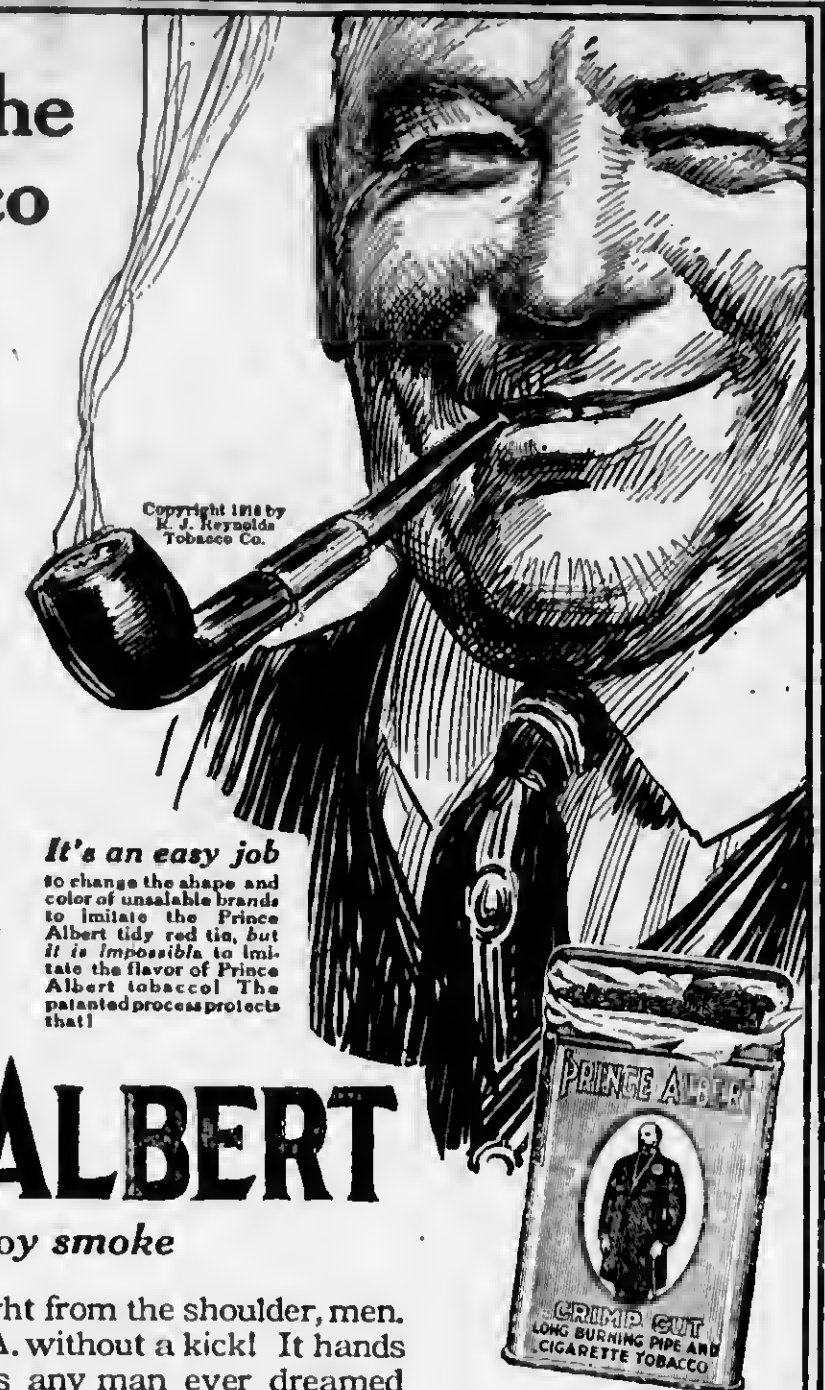

Such a family cough syrup is Foley's Honey and Tar Compound. This standard medicine has been on the market for years and in many sections was found in every home in the days when doctors were not so handy and when money was scarcer.

Foley's Honey and Tar Compound is an excellent medicine for coughs, colds, raw or inflamed throat, hoarseness, tightness and soreness of the chest, croup and whooping cough. It is an absolutely safe remedy, containing only healing ingredients, and free from any harmful drugs.

Married Christmas Day.

A very pretty home wedding was solemnized Christmas afternoon, when Donald Moreau and Miss Jean Colden were united in marriage at the home of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. John Colden of Clarion.

At 4:30 o'clock yellow candles were lighted on two immense Christmas trees at each side of a bower of green, where the bridal couple took their places, and here the ceremony was performed by Rev. E. L. Shepard of Clarion, the ring service being used.

The bride was gowned in gold-colored satin with a spray of California mistletoe in her hair and carried a shower bouquet. At six o'clock a wedding supper was served and the evening spent with music and singing. Only the immediate relatives of the bride and groom were present.

Mr. and Mrs. Moreau took the night train for Petoskey amidst showers of rice, tooting of horns and best wishes. Mrs. Moreau is popular and well known both in her home town and Petoskey, having attended high school there. Mr. Moreau has spent about ten years in Petoskey and is engaged in the floral business.

Delaware's Northern Boundary.

Why the northern boundary of Delaware should have been situated in form is often a source of wonderment. It came about in this way: After William Penn had obtained a grant of Pennsylvania he was desirous of reaching the land on the west bank of the Delaware to the sea. He procured from the Duke of York in 1682 a release of all his title and claim to New Castle and twelve miles around it and to the land between this tract and the sea. A line that was the arc of a circle of a twelve mile radius was then run, with New Castle as a center. When the three "Gower counties" in the Delaware became a state they retained this boundary.—Chicago Journal.

Entered at Charlevoix Postoffice as second class matter.

If any hungry Democratic congressman slipped by the doorkeeper at Representative Wm. B. McKinley's "Get Acquainted" party a few days ago, he probably slunk out the rear door with his free trade ears drooped and then wrote back home to atone the plow in the barn out of the weather and be kind to the old mule, because things were sort of slipping in Washington and he would be back home in 1916 to return to breaking the globe for a considerable spell.

Nothing like that love feast has been witnessed in the New Willard Hotel since Landlord Hight's grandpa wore copper-toed boots. It wasn't one of those sit-down-to-the-table affairs with your next-seat neighbor to talk to and a nimble-footed waiter bothering your elbow, but a buffet luncheon. Tables were ranged along two walls of the big red room, where you could get anything from oysters creamed in a chafing dish to "hot dogs." Good food and no frills. Just step right up and help yourself. Eat it standing and gossip between bites.

The only formality was being introduced to the new members of congress, the "freshmen class," as Congressman Munn calls them. As you stepped into the room you saw before you a long U-shaped line of capable-looking men, each wearing a badge showing the state from which he hailed. You walked along the line and were introduced to each member, and then the glad band. When you arrived at the end of the line the names were shaken up in your memory like the pills in a Kelly pool bottle, but that didn't matter because "by their fruits ye shall know them." After everybody had shaken hands with everybody else the line broke up and there was a general levee of "hold-overs," "come-backers" and "new-comers," to accept Host McKinley's terminology.

The hum of voices and gusts of laughter continued for half an hour, when Representative Martin Madden of Illinois was chosen toastmaster and some of the guests were called upon for impromptu remarks. Senators Harding, Weeks and Sherman ladled out some political hot-shot, and then George O'Connor, Washington's silver-throated tenor, sang some coon songs. When he had finished, Floor Leader Mann addressed the new members, giving some sage advice, before a meeting strangely noncommittal as to what committee assignments he intended for them. The inevitable J. Adam Bede, former representative from Minnesota, followed. Mr. Bede admitted following the Chattanooga circuit, or "Bryan Boulevard," as he calls it, and he punctuated some good Republican logic with a number of side-splitting anecdotes. Senator Wm. Alden Smith was requested to speak, but he had been called out. Finally they passed the buck to "Uncle Joe" Cannon, who—possessed of the vigor of youth and the experience of forty years of political forensics—proceeded to lambaste the Democratic party until nothing was left but the rim, and that was broken. The addresses closed with a few words of welcome from our genial host, Hon. Wm. B. McKinley, who is a "come-backer," and, let it be added, a "stay-hither."

Underlying all the laughter, loquacity and eloquence of the evening was the stern resolve to dislodge the Democracy in 1916 and the firm conviction that it will be done. That feeling pervaded the gathering. It permeated the atmosphere. You could sense it as you entered the room. And, why not? The Republican party presents a united front to-day. The family quarrel is dropped, that the enemy, which sneaked into the house while the family was having it out in the backyard, may be kicked into the street. When Mr. McKinley first proposed the party somebody suggested it be called a "Get Together" party. "Get together, nothing," replied McKinley. "We already are together. We'll call it a 'Get Acquainted' party," and the invitations so announced it, and "an enjoyable time was had by all."

HERBERT L. OLNEY DEAD

Prominent South Arm Citizen Died at Petoskey of Internal Hemorrhage.

Herbert L. Olney, a prominent resident of South Arm, passed away Monday evening at the Lockwood Hospital Petoskey. Mr. Olney was taken there a week ago Monday suffering from a severe attack of appendicitis. He was operated on and was rapidly improving. Monday evening before death ensued he was feeling better than ever and early in the evening fell asleep. Shortly before ten o'clock he was taken with an internal hemorrhage and death resulted with a few minutes. His son took the remains to the home near East Jordan Tuesday. The services will be held at South Arm grange hall Thursday morning at ten o'clock, with interment in the Jones cemetery, about one-half mile from the grange hall.

Deceased is survived by a widow and one son. He leaves a host of friends to mourn their loss. Mr. Olney was a member of the Grange and was beloved by all who knew him.

BEST ROADS IN WORLD.

United States Rapidly Pushing to the Front as a Road Builder.

The United States, through-state and federal aid, is approaching an era of road building which within the next ten years, it is predicted, will give to this country the best system of highways in the world. Progress has been slow because of opposition in some states by the farmers to loans and the fear on the part of the voters that the system would fall into the hands of politicians. Most of the states have built improved highways by bond issues. Where this system has been employed the greatest progress has been made.

The problem of road transportation is one of the chief questions before this country, says J. E. Pennypacker, chief of the division of road economies of the department of agriculture. It costs the farmer 23 cents a ton a mile to haul his product to the railroad or the consumer, where the roads are unimproved. More than 350,000,000 tons are hauled over these roads each year, and the bill for hauling is $850,000,000. The cost per ton mile for hauling on hard surfaced roads does not exceed 13 cents.

The automobilist is paying largely for the building of the good roads. There are 192,000 automobilists registered in the United States who pay a total of more than $12,000,000 annually in registration fees. Forty-two states have established highway departments for educational or administrative work, and of those thirty have made appropriations in aid of road construction or maintenance. In all $208,000,000 had been appropriated from state funds between 1901 and Jan. 1, 1915, for construction, maintenance, administration and educational road work, and a total of about 31,000 miles of improved roads is the result. These roads were built for the most part as a joint state and local undertaking, so that a large part of the cost was included in the state total was involved.

According to the latest figures received by the department of agriculture Pennsylvania has built more than 1,000 miles of road at a cost of more than $20,000,000. New York has expended $80,000,000. Massachusetts and Connecticut have raised their funds for road building by bonds and the applying of the automobile license fees for that purpose.

Under average conditions macadam roads can be built in southern states at from $1,500 to $2,000 a mile, gravel roads at from $1,500 to $2,500 a mile and sand clay and topsoil roads at from $800 to $1,500 a mile. In New England and the other eastern states macadam roads cost from $1,000 to $2,000 a mile, gravel roads $1,200 to $2,000 and bituminous macadam from $8,000 to $12,000.

The average cost of state highways constructed in Ohio in 1913 was $8,383. In California the first 350 miles of the state system of highways cost $8,143 a mile.

A Story of Browning.

Browning himself couldn't always explain his meaning at first reading. Dr. Furnivall, founder of the London Browning society, frequently consulted the poet as to the meaning of some passage in his works. "Does it mean," Browning would say, "I really have forgotten what I did mean, and as I haven't got a copy of my works by me I really can't enlighten you. Just lend me the book, there's a good fellow. I'll look it over at my leisure and try to find out what was in my mind at the time."

"Have you learned anything in the way of business during your four years' loaf at college?" demanded the father.

"Sure," said Reginald. "I can write the daintiest line of darning letters you ever saw."

"Humph!" ejaculated the father. "Who taught you that?"

"My creditors," said Reginald. Life

HOW TO KEEP YOUR PIANO.

Some years ago a piano expert said that it is a mistake to keep a piano tightly closed. The fall board should be left partly closed when one goes away for the summer. This keeps out the greater part of the dust and, what is more important, permits a circulation of air and helps to keep the strings in better condition. He says that the best way to prevent moths from getting into a piano is to have the piano blown out by a professional piano tuner occasionally in order to keep the dust out. Moths will attack new pianos as well as old ones. It is not always possible to guard against them, but the dust can be kept out by a blower. Every piano dealer nowadays has piano blowers to sell, and these little bellows arrangements are not expensive. One can be bought for $3. Ordinarily the tuner will blow out the dust for 50 cents. On a grand piano the owner can use the bellows himself, but it is wiser to have a professional use it on an upright piano. If your piano is a player piano you can get a kinetic blower, which will cost you about $5 and which you can operate yourself.

SOUR CREAM.

How to Utilize This Valuable Food in Various Ways.

The idea with most women is not "What can we do with it, but instead tell us some new ways of using it profitably." Many of us have used sour cream for griddle cakes, biscuits of various kinds, cakes, cookies, short-cakes, puddings, salad dressings, meat sauces, fish sauces and, freezing it with fruit juices, have made most delightful ice cream. And did you ever use sour cream in place of milk in preparing a white sauce for omelets? If not, you have a treat in store. Do not cook the cream too long to allow it to curdle the mixture. But you ask for recipes, and here are just a few:

Sour Cream Cookies.—Take a cupful of sugar and a cupful of molasses to two cupfuls of rich sour cream, add two well beaten eggs, a teaspoonful of soda and one of baking powder, a tablespoonful of ginger, a dash of cinnamon and cloves and enough flour to roll. Let stand on ice to chill before rolling out.

Chocolate Cake.—Take a cupful of brown sugar and half a cupful of sour cream, half a teaspoonful of soda, one egg well beaten, a cupful and a half of flour sifted with a teaspoonful of baking powder. Dissolve two squares of chocolate in half a cupful of boiling water and add to the cake the last thing. Flavor with vanilla and bake in two layers.

Cabbage Salad.—Shred cabbage very fine and plunge into cold water to crisp. Drain and dress with sour cream, sugar, salt and, if not quite sour enough, a very little vinegar may be added. This is a salad which can be enjoyed at any meal with almost any combination of foods.

Sour cream when mixed with fruit juices and sweetened will freeze smooth and velvety. Orange juice with sour cream and sugar to sweeten is a combination especially tasty and delicious. Mix and freeze as an ice cream. Raspberry, grape juice or peach juice are others. Lemon is such an acid with the sour cream also an acid that the result is not so good unless a sour frozen dish is desired.

Hints For Traveling Baby.

The two most common mistakes made in traveling with children are with respect to their clothes and their food. In the hot summer weather, for a long journey, the little child should be dressed only in the sleeveless gauze shirt and diaper, with one thin outer garment. A sleeveless low necked slip of white china silk is best, since it is much cooler than cotton, sheds the dust and can be washed out in the basin when soiled.

It is well to change the baby's clothing as soon as the journey begins in order to have the regular outfit clean to put on when leaving the train. The little baby may go barefooted, but an older child should have barefoot sandals to protect the feet from the children scattered over the floor.

Mothers should observe the same regular hours for feeding their children as at home. One of the worst things she can do is to give the baby cakes, candy, bananas, sweet crackers and the like, as so many mothers do, to keep him quiet in the train. This kind of irregular feeding with unsuitable foods, together with the heat of the train and the fatigue and excitement of traveling, is very apt to upset the baby and make him irritable and restless.

Use a patent bottle to keep baby's milk cool, not warm. The porter will bring you a bowl of hot water to warm the feeding at the regular hour.

How to Renew Worn Tablecloth.

Buy four yards of torchon insertion at a sale; cut it in halves; then cut four squares from the best part of the tablecloth and join to insertion, using the selvages or outside edges for center of cloth, your insertion, of course, to cross the center. Trim edges and hem. Result, a very good looking tablecloth.

Another way is to cut carefully all around, hem it by hand and sew a wide braid on edge on the edge, making a round tablecloth to fit the table. The four corners cut from the above make four small hemstitched napkins.

THREE BURN IN FIRE

Farmers' Inn at Traverse City Scene of Tragic Fire Last Friday Morning.

Because they slept with closed windows and stopped to put on clothing before breaking or opening their windows to make escape possible, Benjamin F. Powers of Traverse City and John Schone of Kingsley lost their lives in the Farmers' Inn at Traverse City last Friday morning. Jacob H. Kinter, the proprietor of the hotel, was a third victim. After reaching safety he went into the burning structure to warn the guests and never returned. Two men were taken from the building by firemen when their calls for help attracted attention. Another man escaped by making a rope from the bedding and sliding to the ground. He threw his clothes out of the window and dressed outside.

The fire was of unknown origin and was discovered by the night man at the Brodhead livery stable across the street. The firemen had a terrific fight to keep the flames from spreading to nearby frame buildings. The flames scorched and seared the whole interior of the building, destroying many of the contents. It is estimated that the loss is about $2,000.

The bodies of the three victims were taken to the various undertaking rooms and prepared for burial. Relatives took charge of the remains. Schone's body being taken to Kingsley.

PETOSKEY PIONEER DEAD

William O'Neill, Owner of the Park House Hotel, Died Saturday.

William O'Neill, proprietor of the Park House Hotel at Petoskey, died at that place Saturday evening after an illness of six years, death being due to Bright's disease. He is survived by a widow and six children, Edward and Arthur O'Neill and Mrs. Maud Cassidy of Bliss, and Mrs. Emma Barrett and George and Leo O'Neill of Petoskey.

The funeral services were from St. Francis church Tuesday morning at nine o'clock, with interment in the St. Francis cemetery.

Besides being a pioneer lumberman, farmer and public official in Emmet county, Mr. O'Neill was perhaps one of the foremost boosters of Northern Michigan. For two years he was chairman of the Emmet county fair association. In October 1909 he moved to Petoskey and purchased the Park House hotel and has since engaged in the hotel business until his death.

Several complaints have been made by teamsters hauling on the road between Charlevoix and Bay Shore, stating that autos have cut the roads in places, making it difficult for them to haul large loads of wood and produce.

It certainly costs something to run the state government these days. The increase in cost since 1900 has been something like two hundred per cent, the figures being as follows: In 1900, $3,992,845.88; 1905, $5,124,685.05; 1910, $6,320,706.70; 1915, $10,528,382.58. The increase in population in that time has been but twenty-five per cent.

The final part of the Elks big hunt which was held New Years day by the members of the Petoskey lodge No. 629 was held Tuesday evening, when the Elks enjoyed a big feed of the delicious prepared game. The side captured by John L. Steward secured 63 rabbits and the crowd captained by George McCabe captured 54, making a total of 117 rabbits. The entire number was served in real style and made a magnificent feast.

Murriel Kizer, age 15 years, of Boyne City was the first victim of Pine Lake since the skating season opened. The boy skated into an air-hole while playing with companions last Friday. The youth held on to the edge of the thin ice while his companions tried to reach him with planks and poles. Finally the ice broke in small pieces as he tried to raise himself. When he lost his strength he sank in about twenty feet of water. Chief Cadwell immediately sent for the grappling hooks and the body was recovered within a half hour. At that time no hopes were entertained for life. The boy was the son of W. H. Kizer, engineer at the iron furnace.

BURNING OUT STUMPS.

Fanning Apparatus Consumes Roots in a Few Hours.

An engineering problem of comparatively recent origin is that of adequate and clearing, particularly as found to the Pacific northwest, says the Engineering Record. In this vicinity what is known as logged off lands are covered with fir and pine stumps of cut down forest trees varying from three to six feet in diameter. With proper clearing these logged off lands are found to be very valuable for agricultural enterprises, being extremely fertile owing to the many years' accumulation of a thick deposit of forest mold. Many methods have been employed for freeing the lands from stumps and preparing for seeding and cultivation, such as grubbing, burning, blasting and pulling either by horse machine or donkey engine. Of these the burning out of the roots is the most favored method, and a special machine has been devised for this purpose.

The use of the burner is particularly simple. A hole is bored down through the center of the stump, and a small stick of powder is employed to split it apart. This splitting, while not entirely essential, facilitates in allowing the fire started on top of the stump to gain rapid headway and burn more evenly. A large metal hood is then pinned over the stump and banked up with a little earth at the bottom and forms a closed but not air tight chamber. A fire is then started and pipe connection from a blower made, after which a constant down blast is blown upon the flame, continually fanning it. Stumps are consumed in this manner in from two to four hours.

Everything is holiday visitors these days.
Mrs. Ellis, who has been planning to start for Saskatchewan this week, is detained by ill health.
Big personal property transfer: Jim Wilson and Ralph Wilkie exchanged Barred Rock roosters the first of the week. No official record has been made, however.
Mr. and Mrs. Tommy Orr drove through here en route to Ellsworth Christmas morning to spend the day and eat turkey with Mrs. Orr's daughter, Mrs. James Boyd.

Mr. and Mrs. Cal. Brooks, whose home is at Belding, have been spending the holidays with relatives here, the family Xmas dinner being at Clarence Fales'. Mrs. Brooks and Mrs. Fales are sisters.
Grant Kirmer has an old-fashioned-sized crew of men getting out wood on E. R. Wilson's place. Mr. Black has a big wood-sawing outfit there and it seems like real old lumbering days to drive along there just now.
The Wilsons had the annual Christmas feast at the cottage by the lake. Those entertained were: Mrs. Cross and Emery Wilson of Central Lake, Miss Kate Wilson of Bellaire, and H. W. Miller of South Dakota.
The Crawford family circle was made complete again at Christmas this year. Duncan from East Jordan, Neal from Ionia, and Miss Ellen from Stanton were the ones away from home who arrived in time for Christmas dinner. Mr. and Mrs. Brundage and little son Donald of Traverse City were also guests who were entertained at the same time.

George Stevens, who is employed as bookkeeper by the Valley City Lumber Company in Grand Rapids, was home for two days only, Christmas and the Sunday following. His friends are always glad to meet him, and his parents are more than glad. His Xmas gifts included a $10 gold piece beautifully mounted in a satin-lined case from his "boss."

Making the Little Farm Pay

By C. C. BOWSFIELD

Geese are in favor as one of many products suitable to a small farm. They are profitable in the production of meat and are easily managed. The larger breeds grow to a weight of fifteen to eighteen pounds. The prices which farmers may obtain range from $2 to $2.50 for each fowl.
The cost for food in raising geese is less for each dollar's worth of meat produced than it is in the case of chickens, ducks, cattle or hogs. It is also an established fact that geese are the hardest of domestic fowls and require the least care. They thrive on common pasture, making rapid growth on grass alone. Alfalfa and red clover are still better for them. It is true that the flesh is improved and growth hastened by moderate feeding of corn meal, rolled oats and bran, slightly moistened.
When a commercial business is planned the first feed for goslings is grass, fed on such a small allowance of meal slightly moistened may be given after they are a day old. Sand and charcoal should be added. They are fed on this food three times a day for a week, besides being allowed to run on grass. If they are to be quickly fattened give a ration composed of equal parts by measure of bran, middlings and steamed clover or cooked vegetables. This feed is given morning, noon and night until they are eight weeks old, when they are penned to be fattened for market at ten weeks.

To finish the fattening of young geese place them in a pen not so large that they will exercise too much and feed three times a day all they will eat up clean of the following: Corn meal mixed to a dry, crumbly state, and beef scraps amounting to 20 per cent of the bulk of the corn meal. Bran or middlings may be added in small quantities. While fattening young geese they should be kept as quiet as possible; nothing should be allowed to excite them. At ten weeks of age they will weigh eight or nine pounds and be in good condition for marketing. It is safe to count on geese making two-thirds of their growth on pasture. They will do well on common field grass, clover, rape or any of the ordinary forage crops.
If there is no chance to provide a suitable pasture it is unwise to keep geese. The fowls should have an acre or two to themselves. It does not matter if the land is rough or marshy. Some kind of a swimming place is needed. It is also bad policy to keep these fowls in poorly ventilated houses. They must have fresh air and clean surroundings. It is best to keep goslings shut up in a yard for two or three weeks before allowing them on range.
In the final preparation of grown geese for market they are to be kept in quite closely for two or three weeks and fed three times a day about as follows: Bran, two parts; shorts, one part; oil meal and beef scraps, one part; cornmeal, one part, dampened with water so it will crumble. A little whole corn is sometimes given. Green food, grit and water should be kept before them. Keep them penned up in small numbers. Around Thanksgiving and Christmas and, in fact, most of the winter the market is good.
The Gray African, the Embden and the Gray Toulouse are the large, money making breeds. Ganders of the highest type should be used, but should be killed when three or four years old, as they are then declining in virility. The females are best for egg production when upward of three years old. Hens should be used for hatching the goslings and caring for them during the first couple of weeks. There is no better method of developing a good flock than to buy a lot of well bred goslings. At least one setting of eggs or a dozen good young males should be bought every season in order to get the best results in breeding. An amateur starting in this business need not worry about the type, as all the large standard fowls are excellent. Give them a little systematic attention and they will return good profits.

FARMERS QUERY COLUMN

Mail All Questions to This Office or to H. L. Barnum, Ironton, Michigan

Question—In cases cows are not allowed free access to salt, how much should they be given daily?

Answer—From three-fourths to one ounce of salt per day is the amount stated by Henry as a reasonable allowance.

Question—Do you think soil which has limestone in it would be sour? Explain the litmus paper test for sour soils.

Answer—The presence of fragments of limestone rock in the soil, as we so commonly find in this part of the state, does not necessarily indicate an alkaline or sweet condition of the soil. Raw limestone—or calcium carbonate, as the unburned rock is called—does not serve to neutralize the soil acids, which make the soil sour, unless it is very finely pulverized; and the pieces of limestone in the field do not crumble fast enough to keep a cultivated field sweet. Thus it is possible to find sour soil within a few inches of a chunk of rock which, if pulverized, would be sufficient to sweeten the soil over several rods.

As the productivity of soils with respect to certain crops depends on the reaction in acid tests, it is quite important that these tests be made occasionally. Of the several methods used to determine the condition of the soil, besides the observation of crop growth, one of the simplest is called the litmus paper test. This depends upon the effects of acids on the vegetable coloring matter, called litmus, which is used to make the familiar little blue strips of testing paper. A drop of vinegar, which is sour because it contains acetic acid, will turn the color of the little blue strips to pink; and some ammonia or limewater, which are alkaline, will cause the blue color to return if they are strong enough to neutralize the acid.

In making the test it is only necessary generally to press a piece of the blue paper between two handfuls of moist soil and leave for five minutes, observing always the following precautions:—The paper should be fresh and sensitive to very small amounts of acid. Do not touch the paper with sweaty fingers. If the soil is dry, moisten with water not acid in itself. Soils rich in organic matter seldom give satisfactory results with litmus. The degree of change of color indicates approximately the degree of sourness. Do not mistake finger marks on the paper for indications of acids in the soil.

Question—I have a twelve foot silo with twenty-two feet of silage in it. How many tons of silage? What is silage worth a ton?

Answer—A silo of this size will contain approximately 42 tons of silage.

For feeding dairy cows it has been found that 400-450 pounds of average silage are worth 100 pounds of mixed hay. At this rate, therefore, average silage, compared with mixed hay worth $15 a ton, is worth $3.33 a ton. Discounting this 10 per cent. on account of the poor quality of corn silage this year and we get $3 as an approximate valuation.

HIGH VELOCITY STARS.

Their Fearful Rate of Speed in Space is Somewhat Puzzling.

The average velocity of stars ranges from about six kilometers, or between three and four miles, per second for "young" stars to about thirty kilometers per second for "old" ones. But notable exceptions occur. At Mount Wilson solar observatory of the Carnegie Institution some stars have been found to move with velocities of 141, 150, 179, 233, 314 and even 325 kilometers per second, the highest speed yet known.

These high velocity stars are sometimes described as runaways because they seem to be quite beyond the control of the gravitational power of the universe. At their speed the attraction of the entire known stellar system would be wholly insufficient to check the star's career through space.

The astronomer, Simon Newcomb, once calculated that the maximum velocity attained by a body starting with velocity zero at an infinite distance and passing through a stellar system containing 100,000,000 stars each five times as massive as our sun and distributed throughout a disklike spheroid of certain extent cannot exceed 40 kilometers per second. Yet the star "Groombridge 1830" has a speed nearly nine times this value, and the massive star Arcturus has a speed probably four times this value.

If existing velocities owe their magnitudes to the gravitation of the system the quantity of attracting matter in the whole stellar system would have to be at least eighty times that assumed by the calculations of Professor Newcomb.—Baltimore American.

HE ASKED FOR DONALD.

And Much to His Surprise He Got the Answer He Sought.

Dr. Norman Macleod, the famous Scottish divine, before visiting India, called on an old highland woman in Glasgow, says a writer in the Scottish American. "When ye gang tae India," he said, "ye'll be aerd' m' Donald that went nwa the India ten years ago an' never sent the scrapie of a pen tae his mither since."

"But, Kattie," said the doctor, "India is a very big place, and how can I expect to find him?"

"Oh, but ye'll just be askin' for Donald. What for no?"

So, to please the old woman, he promised to ask for Donald, and he conscientiously kept his word. At various ports he made inquiry among British ships, although it seemed very much like looking for a needle in a bale of hay. But it is the unexpected that happens. As Dr. Macleod's steamer went up the Ganges river an outboard bound vessel passed close by. A sailor was leaning over her bulwark, and, moved by a sudden impulse, the doctor shouted out:

"Are you Donald Macleod?"

To his intense surprise the man answered, "Yes."

Dr. Macleod had only time to shout, "You're to write to your mother!" as the vessels drew apart. The result of his amazing meeting was that the old lady received a penitential letter from her long neglected son.

Not Quite.

"Young man," inquired her father sternly, "will you give her a home like the one she has been used to?"

"No," replied the truthful sutor, "for there will be no grumpy father to come home and unke every one miserable by his kicking over trifles and swearing at matters in general. There will be no mother to scold her from morning to night for wasting time merely because she wants to be neat. There will be no big brother to unke her for not doing half of his work and no little brother to make enough noise to drive her crazy when her head aches. There won't be any younger sister to insist on reading some trashy novel while she does all the work. She will not have with me a home like she has been used to, not if I can help it."—Boston Journal.

A Monstrous Tide.

Take the harbor of St. John, as an illustration of what this mighty tide must be. In most parts of the world a tide of ten feet is considered something abnormal, but at St. John it rises twenty to twenty-four feet in good weather. In stormy weather the monstrosity is varied by the high water mark being pushed up even ten or fifteen feet higher.

COOL AND HIS MONEY

BY GEORGE BARR MCCUTCHEON

SYNOPSIS.
John Bellamy Smart, unmarried and heir to a fortune, while abroad with his secretary, Poppenyke, and his valet, Britton, buys a dilapidated old castle on the Danube, in care of the Schmicks, and discovers a mysterious woman inhabiting one of the towers.

Smart feels to batter down a huge door leading to the east wing in search of the fair lady. He interrupts a visit of American relic hunters.

Their amazing attempt to buy some of the castle's ancient furniture results in their discomfiture and hurried departure. Smart catches a glimpse of his fair neighbor's waving hair.

Another visit to the mysterious east wing fails, but later the beautiful stranger strikes up an acquaintance with the new owner through a secret loophole.

She agrees to entertain him at tea. Meanwhile he learns the history of the old castle from the Schmicks and receives a visit from a crowd of tourists.

Refusing to be put off by the fair chatelaine's plea of a headache, Smart batters down the doors to the maiden's apartments, where a surprise awaits him.

He learns she is a rich American girl, divorced from her nobleman husband, and is in hiding, having kidnapped her own baby.

The Hazzards, friends of Smart, visit the castle, bringing with them the countess' husband, manufacturing Mr. Pless. Smart learns the villa's identity.

Smart asks the countess to tell her husband's attempt to find his way through a secret door and tries to throw the count off the track.

Smart dines with the countess in celebration of the departure of the count and other guests and she speaks of buried treasure.

CHAPTER X.

I Receive Visitors.

THE east wing of the castle was as still as a mouse on the day my house party arrived. Grim old doors took on new pall-lorlocks, keyholes were carefully stopped up, creaking floors were calked, and yet I trembled. My secret seemed to be safely planted, but what would the harvest be?

Elsie Hazzard presented me to her friends, and with cordial generosity I presented the castle to them.

There was a Russian baron whom for brevity's sake I'll call Umovitch. There was a Chinese gentleman of twenty-six or eight, I heard, but who looked forty. His name was Pless. He was a plump miser.

By this time I had myself pretty well in hand. I dressed the mother and child, which ought to condone me among her multitude of sins. I take it, of course, that she was entirely blame for everything that happened.

They at once proceeded to tear the poor little mother to shreds, delicately and with finesse, to be sure, but none the less completely.

"What was her social standing in New York?" I inquired.

"Oh, good enough," said Betty Billy. "She was in the smartest set. It is a recommendation."

To my disgust the three of them refused to enlighten me further as to the history, identity or character of either Mr. or Mrs. Pless, but at once I knew that I was entertaining under my roof by the most extraordinary coincidence the Count and Countess of something or other, who were at war, and the child they were fighting for with motives of an entirely opposite nature.

"What time do we dine?" asked Mr. Pless later, with a suppressed yawn.

"At six," said Elsie promptly.

"I think I'll take a nap," said he with a smug smile and a bit of drama at his mouth as it disengaged us, he moved languidly off, and stopped after a few steps to say to me, "Watch my phone the castle tomorrow, Mr. Smart, if it's just the same to you." He spoke with a very solemn air and in a peculiarly attractive manner. There was charm in the man, I was bound to admit. "I know Schloss Rothboffen very well. It is an old standing ground of mine."

"Indeed!" said I, affecting surprise.

"I spent a very joyous season here and so many years ago. Hohensand is a famous friend."

I was eager to steal away to the east wing with the news, so somewhat late I knocked at the countess' door.

I realized that it was a most unbecomingly hour for calling on a young, beautiful and unprepared lady, but the exigencies of the moment lent moral support to my invasion.

The countess' French maid peered out at me.

"Tell your mistress that I must see her at once."

"Madame is not at home, m'sieur," said the young woman.

"Not at home?" I gasped. "Where is she?"

"Poor fellow!" she sighed. "He is in great trouble, John. We hoped that we got him off more where it is quiet. He might be able to forget. Oh, but I am not supposed to tell you a word of the story. We are all sworn to secrecy."

"Women," said Billy impressively. "Then it's easily palmed," said I. "Like ruses like."

"You don't understand, John," said Elsie gravely. "He was married to a beautiful—"

"Now, Elsie, you're telling," cautioned Betty Billy—Mrs. Billy Smith.

"Well," said Elsie doggedly, "I'm determined to tell this much. His name isn't Pless. His wife got a divorce from him, and now she has taken their child and run off with it, and they can't find what's the matter."

My eyes were almost popping from my head.

"Isn't he a count?" I cried, so loudly that they all said "Sh!" and shot apprehensive glances toward the pseudo Mr. Pless.

"Countess," said Elsie in alarm. "Don't shout, John."

Betty Smith regarded me speculatively. "Darkest Mr. Smart has read all about the affair in the newspapers."

"I haven't seen anything about it in the papers," said I, trying to recover my self-possession which had sustained a most tremendous shock.

"Thank heaven!" cried Elsie devoutly.

"The poor fellow is almost distracted. Really, Mr. Smart, we planned this little visit here simply in order to take him out of himself for awhile. It has been such a tragedy for him. He worshipped the child." It was Mrs. Billy who spoke.

"And the mother made way with him?" I queried, resorting to a suddenly acquired cunning.

"It is a girl," said Elsie in a loud whisper—"the latest girl. The mother appeared in Vienna about three weeks or a month ago and—what?—off goes the child. Abducted—kidnaped? And the court had granted him the custody of the child. That's what makes it so terrible. If she is caught anywhere in Europe—well, I don't know what may happen to her. It is just silly acts as this that make American girls the laughingstocks of the whole world."

By this time I had myself pretty well in hand.

"I dressed the mother and child, which ought to condone me among her multitude of sins. I take it, of course, that she was entirely blame for everything that happened."

They at once proceeded to tear the poor little mother to shreds, delicately and with finesse, to be sure, but none the less completely.

"What time do we dine?" asked Mr. Pless later, with a suppressed yawn.

"At six," said Elsie promptly.

"I think I'll take a nap," said he with a smug smile and a bit of drama at his mouth as it disengaged us, he moved languidly off, and stopped after a few steps to say to me, "Watch my phone the castle tomorrow, Mr. Smart, if it's just the same to you." "I spent a very joyous season here and so many years ago. Hohensand is a famous friend."

I was eager to steal away to the east wing with the news, so somewhat late I knocked at the countess' door.

I realized that it was a most unbecomingly hour for calling on a young, beautiful and unprepared lady, but the exigencies of the moment lent moral support to my invasion.

The countess' French maid peered out at me.

"Tell your mistress that I must see her at once."

"Madame is not at home, m'sieur," said the young woman.

"Not at home?" I gasped. "Where is she?"

"Poor fellow!" she sighed. "He is in great trouble, John. We hoped that we got him off more where it is quiet. He might be able to forget. Oh, but I am not supposed to tell you a word of the story. We are all sworn to secrecy."

"Women," said Billy impressively. "Then it's easily palmed," said I. "Like ruses like."

"You don't understand, John," said Elsie gravely. "He was married to a beautiful—"

"Now, Elsie, you're telling," cautioned Betty Billy—Mrs. Billy Smith.

"Well," said Elsie doggedly, "I'm determined to tell this much. His name isn't Pless. His wife got a divorce from him, and now she has taken their child and run off with it, and they can't find what's the matter."

"Madame has gone to bed." "Oh!" I said blankly. "Then she is at home. Present my compliments and ask her to get up. Something very exciting is going on."

"Madame has requested me to inform m'sieur that she knows the count is here and will be so good as to call tomorrow morning."

"What! She knows he's here? Who brought the information?"

"The beautiful Max, m'sieur. He brought it with defenestration, again with dinner and but now with the hot water, m'sieur."

"Oh, I see," said I profoundly. "In that case I—shall I disturb her?"

Very stiffly and ceremoniously I advised caution for the next two live hours and left.

Now it may occur to you that any self-respecting gentleman in possession of a castle and a grain of common sense would have set about to find out the true names of the guests beneath his roof. But it so happens that I rather enjoyed the mystery. The situation was unique, the comedy most exhilarating. Of course there was a tragic side in the whole matter, but now that I was in for it, why minimize the novelty by adopting arbitrary measures? Somewhat gleefully I decided that it would be good fun to keep myself in the dark as long as possible.

When I reached the room where my guests were assembled I found Mr. Pless and the Baron Umovitch engaged in an acrimonious dispute over a question of bridge etiquette. The former had resented a sharp criticism coming from the latter, and they were waging a verbal battle in what I took to be five or six different tongues.

None of which appeared to bear the slightest relationship to the English language. Suddenly Mr. Pless threw his cards down and left the table without a word of apology to the ladies, who looked more hurt than appalled.

He said he was going to bed, but I noticed that he took himself off in the direction of the moonlit loggia. We were still discussing his defection in subdued tones, with the exception of the faint baron—when he re-entered the room.

"Are there real spirits in your castle, Mr. Smart, or have you flesh and blood mediums here who roam about in white night dresses to study the moods of the moon from the dullest ramparts?"

I started, what indiscretion had the countess been up to?

"I don't quite understand you, Mr. Pless," I said, with a politely blank stare.

"My dear countess," said I the next morning, "while I am willing to admit that all you say is true, there still remains the unhappy fact that you were very near to upsetting every thing last night. Mr. Pless saw you quite plainly. The moon was very full, you'll remember. Fortunately it was too far away from your window to recognize you. Think how easy it might be."

"But I've told you twice that I held my hand over Pinkie's nose, and he just couldn't bark, Mr. Smart. You are really most unreasonably about it. The dog had to have a breath of fresh air."

"Why not send him up to the top of the tower and let him run around on the roof?"

"Oh, there's no use talking about it any longer," she said wearily. "It is all over, and no real harm was done. I am awfully sorry it they made it so uncomfortable for you."

"And now will you be good enough to tell me who I am?" she asked after a few minutes. "That is, who am I supposed to be?"

"Oh, I'm a misanthrope. You are really anybody? You are Britton's wife?"

"What! Does Britton know it?"

"Yes, said I, with a wry smile. "He took a mean advantage of me in the presence of George Hazzard not an hour ago and asked for a raise in wages on account of his wife's illness. It seems that you are an invalid."

"I hope he hasn't forgotten the baby in his calculations."

"He hasn't, you may be sure. He has named the baby after me."

"How original!"

"I thought it rather clever to change Rosamond's sex for a few days," said I.

"And may I tell me all about Mr. Pless?" she said. "How is he looking? Does he appear to be unhappy?" There was a curious note in her voice, as of anxiety or eagerness, it was hard to tell which.

"He appears to be somewhat sentimental and preoccupied. He gazes at the moon and bites his nails."

"I wish I could have a peep in him some time without being!"

"For heaven's sake, don't even consider such a thing!" I cried in alarm.

"Just a little peep, Mr. Smart," she pleaded.

"No," said I firmly.

"Very well," she said resignedly, fixing me with her eyes. "I'm sorry to be such a bother to you."

"I believe you'll go back to him after all," I said angrily. "Women are all alike. They—"

"Just because I want to see how unhappy he is and enjoy myself a little by saying horrid things to me!" she cried almost pathetically. "You treat me very badly."

"There is a great deal at stake," said I. "The peril is well, it's enormous. I am having my own time heading off a scheme they've got for exploiting the castle. Your husband's out of his mind."

"What?"

"What?"

"What?"

"What?"

"What?"

"What?"

"What?"

"What?"

"What?"

and says he knows of a secret door opening into this part of the—"

CHAPTER XI.

I Resort to Diplomacy.

THE countess sprang to her feet with a sharp cry of alarm.

"Heaven, I—I forgot about that! There is a secret panel, and—"

and—heaven save us!—it opens directly into my bedroom!" Her eyes were very wide and full of consternation. She gripped my arm. "Come! Be quick! We must pile something against it or nail it up or do something!"

She fairly dragged me out into the corridor and then, picking up her slinky skirts, padded down the rickety stairs at so swift a pace that I had some difficulty in keeping her pink dress in sight. Why is it that a woman can go downstairs so much faster than a man? I've never been able to explain it.

At last we came to the broad hall at the top of the main staircase. Almost directly in front of us loomed the great padlocked doors leading to the other wing. Passing them like the wind, she led the way to the farthest end of the hall. Light from the big paneless windows overlooking the river came streaming into the vast corridor, and I could see doors ahead to the right and the left of us.

"Your bedroom?" I managed to gasp, uttering a belated question that should have been asked five or six flights higher up at a time when I was better qualified to voice it. "What the dickens is it doing down here?"

She did not reply, but, turning to the left, there—open a door and disappeared into the room beyond. I followed ruthlessly, but stopped just over the threshold to catch my breath in astonishment.

I was in "my lady's bedchamber."

The immense Gothic bed stood on its dais, imposing in its isolation. Three or four very modern innovation trunks loomed like minarets against the opposite walls half open. Some of my most precious ruses adorned the floor, but the windows were absolutely unadorned.

"Don't stand there gaping!" she cried in a shrill whisper. "This is the mirror, the middle one. It opens by means of a spring. There is a small hole in the wall behind it, and then there is still another secret door beyond that. A thick iron one with the sixth Baron Rothboffen's portrait on the outer side of it. The canvas swings open. We must—"

I was beginning to get my bearings.

"The sixth baron? Old Ludwig the Red?"

"The very one."

"Then by Jove he is in my study. You don't mean to say?"

"Please don't stop to talk!" she cried impatiently, looking about in a distracted manner. "But for goodness sake get something to put against this mirror!"

My mind worked rapidly. The only object in the room heavy enough to serve as a barricade was the bed, and it was too heavy for me to move. I gladly to inquire whether the popular demand for new leadership is actually so strong as to give this new man the greatest political prize over which men struggle.

An All Around Big Man.

Estabrook is a big man physically, mentally and politically. Quite six feet in height, erect, rugged, he would be a man of commanding presence in any gathering. His mental attainments are attested by his signal success in the practice of law and by the wide spread interest in his every public utterance on governmental, economic and social problems. He has always been a student and when he discusses a subject he speaks with the authority of one who has mastered it. His conclusions are invariably sound, and once he has arrived at them, they are proclaimed frankly and fearlessly, for he is essentially a man with the courage of his convictions.

For instance, he has been one of the most drastic critics of President Wilson and the present Democratic administration, arraigning them for their tariff law which bankrupted the federal treasury and which places the American farmer, the American manufacturer, and the American laborer at the mercy of foreign competition, and for a foreign policy which has destroyed the respect that the American flag and American citizens once commanded in every quarter of the globe.

A Preparedness Pioneer.

Likewise Mr. Estabrook was the first man prominently before the public to outline a concrete program of national defense, which he presented in an address before the American Bankers Association September 8th last at Seattle, characterized by the Seattle Times as "one of the most remarkable addresses ever delivered in the Northwest," and he was the first Republican leader to point the way to the reunion and harmonizing of all elements of the party, his "Get-Together" plea before the McKinley Club of Omaha, Nebraska, last October, having attracted wide spread attention.

From the time Mr. Estabrook opened the Republican National campaign in Chicago in 1906 he has been recognized as one of the ablest campaigners in the United States, and there have been few speakers in greater demand.

The issues in the great contest of 1914, which is to restore the Republican party to the administration of national affairs, will be Protection, Prosperity, and Preparedness, in Mr. Estabrook's judgment, with "Get-Together" feared. I suggested it, of course, in voluntarily lowering my voice to a conspiratorial whisper.

"Put it over, quick!" she commanded promptly.

"Perhaps I'd better run out and get Max and Ed."

"I'll try," said I. Mr. Pless opened that secret door from the other side, Mr. Smart. It will be very embarrassing for you and me. Let."

I put my shoulder to the huge creaky bed and shoved. There were no creaks. It did not budge. The countess assisted me by putting the tips of her small fingers against one end of it and pushing. It was not what one would call a frantic effort on her part, but it served to make me exert myself to the utmost.

"Don't do that," I protested. "I can manage it alone, thank you."

I secured a strong grip on the bottom of the thing and heaved manfully. "You might let me help!" she cried firmly grasping a side piece with both hands.

BIG IMPETUS FOR ESTABROOK BOOM

"Dark Horse" For Republican Presidential Nomination.

NATIONAL DEFENSE PIONEER

Known as Fearless Advocate of Traditional Republican Principles—Also Recognized as One of Ablest Campaigners in United States.

Far and away the most interesting phase of the national political situation is the movement that has brought Henry D. Estabrook, of New York and Nebraska, so prominently to the front as a candidate for the Republican presidential nomination. First spoken of as a possibility in connection with the presidency less than six months ago, Mr. Estabrook is today one of the leading candidates, with evidences of strength that are a source of concern to the friends of the other aspirants.

He has made speeches in every important city in the East, Middle West, and Far West, an arduous campaign experience that has put him in good condition to meet the rigorous demands made on the head of a party's national ticket, and his friends in Nebraska and other States have formed Estabrook organizations and are going after national delegates in the most vigorous fashion.

Impartial observers agree that this development of the Estabrook boom has no parallel in the political history of the last 25 years, and they are beginning to inquire whether the popular demand for new leadership is actually so strong as to give this new man the greatest political prize over which men struggle.

Temperance

(Conducted by the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union.)

NO USE FOR IT IN FIVE YEARS.

A leading banker of Wisconsin vouches for the following incident:

Within the past year the managers of a brewery in one of the smaller cities of the state decided to build a new malt house at a cost of $25,000. They commissioned their president to go to Milwaukee and effect a loan. He naturally went to one of the big brewery-controlled banks of that city. The Vice-president to whom he applied for the loan, was formerly in the brewing business and had made a handsome fortune in that business during the palmy days before the drys had begun to knock the big profits out of it. He very wisely got out of the business when the getting was good, not as now, when brewing stocks are all shot to pieces.

To this utter surprise and chagrin of the out-of-town brewer he was promptly refused the loan. He exclaimed: "What's the matter? With all this fine property we got, ain't we good for $25,000?"

Quick came the answer from the ax-brewer-banker: "But what do you want to use the $25,000 for?"

"To build a malt house, so we can enlarge our business," said the brewer.

"But, you fool, don't you know that in five years you will have no use whatever for a malt house?" replied the banker.

CAMPAIGN PLANS.

As part of the campaign program for the year the National W. C. T. U. has adopted the following: Increased activity of the Young People's branch in all lines of campaign work; the Loyal Temperance legion (children's branch) to have part in public meetings, demonstrations and parades; campaign illustrations to be held in the interests of national constitutional prohibition at state capitals, also county institutes at county seats, for the education and inspiration of temperance workers and the general public; special campaign material furnished the newspapers by the W. C. T. U. bureau of publicity; parades, street meetings, modal contests, rallies and other public demonstrations to be held frequently, securing the co-operation of Sunday schools, circulation of the Sunday school petition for national constitutional prohibition to be urged; the relation of woman's ballot to the destruction of the liquor traffic emphasized; the use of posters and poster parades recommended, July 4 and October 12 designated as National Poster days; W. C. T. U. speakers to present in public addresses the status of and reasons for national constitutional prohibition and secure the endorsement of the joint resolution for it.

PLACARDS IN DRY PARADE.

"A beef joint beats a booze joint."

"The path of misery leads from the saloon door."

"You can't buy dry goods with money spent for wet goods."

"The cause of drunkenness is license; the cure is total abstinence."

"One home in four must furnish a boy for the saloon. What about you boy?"

"Chicago knows enough to enme the wet."

"We'll make the water wagon run fitny bus."

"A dry Chicago means a clean Chicago."

"Who gets your next pay envelope?"

"The saloon is the poor man's clerk that kicks him out after he has paid his dues."

"Nineteen dry states. Come on you Illinois! The water's fine."

"The last to be hired, the first to be fired—the boozier."

"Nothing to drink Sunday; else head Monday."

"When you down booze, that is personal liberty; when booze downs you that is slavery."

ADVICE TO UNCLE SAM.

There is a certain queer old book which was printed in England more than a hundred years ago called, "The Pleasant Art of Money-Catching." It contains this good advice: "First see that your comings-in be more than your layings-out." Suppose a man were taking ten thousand dollars a year over the counter of his store. That might seem big to him. But he had to pay ten thousand and one dollars for stock and rent and hold and fire, he would not be prospering, but failing. Uncle Sam does get great deal of money from the liquor traffic. But he and we spend a very great deal more in caring for its victims. So this is bad business, and when enough people have found it out the liquor traffic will go. They are finding it out very fast. Everybody who has studied arithmetic can figure out the reason for national prohibition. It is a matter of dollars and cents.—Christine Tinsling.

FARMERS FOR PROHIBITION.

The Farmers' National congress, assembled in Omaha for its thirty-first annual meeting, proclaimed the prohibition principles of the farmers of the country in the following message to the Nebraska dry convention then in session at Lincoln:

"The Farmers' National congress has for many years been on record in opposition to the legalizing of the liquor traffic. Our sympathies and efforts are with the convention for a dry Nebraska and a dry nation."

STEEL DRIVE BELTS

Displacing Leather and Cotton in Germany and England.

In Europe, more particularly in Germany, steel belts have been employed to the displacement of leather and cotton drives, says the American Machinery.

list. The Elosser system has comparatively lately been introduced in Great Britain, where a considerable number of main drives have been installed with success.

In particular the length of belt to be determined with considerable accuracy. For this purpose a small standard of kouzu section is mounted on the pulleys, driver and driven, and tension frame is fitted to the ends of this measuring band. Usage is calibrated nut and spring, the two ends of frame are drawn together until tension, as shown by a scale, is equal to that desired in the belt when running. One of the pulleys is then slow rotated without changing the belt friction, changing the tension indicated. While next the other pulley is rotated in the reverse direction, thus again changing the tension, and the meeting of the two should correspond to the desired working tension. The belt can then be cut to the exact length with the ends meeting, and when moved from the tension apparatus used as a template to the length of driving belt itself.

The material is stated to be charcoal, rough rolled at a red heat, tensile strength obtained being about ninety-five tons, 212,800 pounds to the square inch.

A Roman dinner at the house worthy man consisted chiefly of trifles. All sorts of stimulants to the appetite were first served up, and a variety of dishes were then presented, which were indispensable to the first course. Among the various dishes we may mention the golden hen, pheasant, many kinds of fowls, the quail, the partridge, the hazel and the thrush as birds most in repute. The Roman gourmands took peacocks in great estimation, especially for their tongues. Macrobius states that they were first eaten by Horatius, the orator, and acquired such reputation that a single peacock was sold for a denarii, the denarius being equal to about eightpence. Michigan Is in for a Big Political Year

---Primaries and Conventions.

All Offices from President to Constable to be Filled During 1916.

Politically speaking, 1916 is going to be a big year in Michigan. From the date of the presidential primary, April 3rd, until after the general November election politics will hold the right of way in the state. Already the activity of the politicians is apparent about Lansing.

From president to constable all public offices are to be filled during the coming year and there will be local option and special elections in several counties.

Following close on the heels of the April primary will come the state conventions of all political parties. At these conventions the results of the primaries will be ratified, delegates-at-large to the national conventions will be elected and state central committees will be chosen.

With the close of the national conventions will come a midsummer lull in state politics. Not until the August primaries will the political whirl be in full swing again. Then the party candidates for governor, lieutenant-governor, United States senator, congressman and members of the state legislature will be chosen. Party candidates for justice of the supreme court, secretary or state, attorney general, auditor general and state treasurer will be named at state conventions which follow closely the August primaries.

The general election November 7 will be the grand finale. In addition to the national and state officers to be elected at that time one hundred members of the Michigan house of representatives and thirty-two state senators will be chosen. Full county tickets will be named. Circuit judges will be elected in several counties where vacancies exist and a number of constitutional questions will be decided.

Program of 1916 Politics.

Local option and special elections in several counties.

Presidential primaries April 3rd. Party conventions to ratify primary results to elect delegates-at-large to national conventions and choose state central committees.

August primary for governor, lieutenant-governor, United States senator, congressman and members of the state legislature.

State conventions to elect party candidates for secretary of state, attorney general, auditor general, state treasurer and justices of the supreme court.

General elections November 7 for the selection of all national and state officers and county officials.

Six Inches of Snow

According to a letter received Monday from George E. McNally of Everett, Washington, the west is getting its share of the bitter cold weather. Mr. McNally says there was six inches of snow at Everett on January 4, and freezing weather, something almost unknown in that section of the country. He also stated that he anxiously looked for the Courier each week and sent greeting to his many Charlevoix friends and acquaintances.

Making Good.

A recent issue of the Kansas City Star contains a two column write-up from the pen of J. L. Crane, Jr., giving the details of an up-to-date water system for suburban or farm homes. Pen drawings show the system up in a fine manner, and it is claimed by Mr. Crane that in can be installed in any home under ordinary circumstances for $18.00. We are glad that a Charlevoix boy is making the record now being made by Mr. Crane.

Auction Sale.

On page 2 of this issue will be found the Auction Sale of George W. Ford, one mile west of Bay Shore, commencing at 10:00 sharp, Wednesday, January 19. W. E. Byers, auctioneer; Frank VanSchoick, clerk.

Card of thanks.

We wish to thank our friends who so kindly assisted during our bereavement. Mrs. G. A. Newberry, Mr. and Mrs. C. R. Bellinger and family, Mrs. E. Newberry, Mrs. E. Hodge. Adv. 211

Special 1916 Plan at Baptist Church.

One of the world's best books will be discussed from our pulpit once each month during 1916 in an evening service. Henry VanDyke's famous book "The Mansion" will be given next Sunday evening. Also watch for our monthly stereopticon lecture evening service which during this year will cover the worldwide field of missions. The lectures will be of intense interest.

Yours for Christ and the church,
Lloyd C. Vinyard, Pastor.

SERVICES HELD LAST SUNDAY

Pneumonia Takes George A. Newberry, Former Charlevoix Resident.

Had Been Identified with Salvation Army and Mission Work During Entire Life.

The funeral of the late George A. Newberry was held from the Methodist church Sunday, Rev. Quinton Walker officiating. Mr. Newberry was taken sick in Saginaw about two weeks ago and grew rapidly worse until Thursday of last week, when death relieved him of his suffering. Pneumonia was the cause of his death, brought on by overwork and exposure during the busy weeks of mission work before the holidays.

Mr. Newberry's entire life had been spent in rescue mission and Salvation Army work. Born July 13, 1857, in Lapeer county, as soon as he became old enough he took up Army work. He continued at this and did rescue mission work about his native town until he was about 23 years of age, when he moved to Traverse City and continued his efforts. There he met and married in July, 1887, Ada Hodge, a sister of Mrs. Charles R. Bellinger of this city, who survives him.

He lived in Charlevoix about six years, leaving here about twelve years ago. He traveled from city to city in Indiana and Michigan doing mission and Army work. About six years ago they located in Saginaw, where Mr. Newberry took up the superintendency of the West Side Rescue Mission. In 1915 it was through his efforts that a new home for the mission was secured. It was through his untiring and faithful work that the success of the mission was due, and no man in that city was held in higher esteem than the deceased.

Funeral services were held at the mission at Saginaw last Friday afternoon at four o'clock conducted by six of the ministers of the west side churches. The remains arrived in Charlevoix Saturday afternoon and were taken to the home of Mr. and Mrs. C. R. Bellinger. The body was placed in the receiving vault at Brookside cemetery.

Notice to Ice Cutters

People cutting ice this season on either Pine or Round Lakes are warned to take special precaution in protecting the public against the danger of driving or walking into sections where ice cutting operations are taking place. All persons engaged in this work will be required to fence in the fields where they are cutting, not by simply using blocks of ice, but by completely fencing in all open places. Fish holes on Round Lake must also be protected in the same manner. All neglect in this respect will be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law.

MILLIONS OF FISH EGGS COLLECTED DURING YEAR IN MICHIGAN WATERS

State Plays an Important Part in Replenishing Waters--Ciscos and Whitefish Have the Largest Representation--35,000,000 Gathered in St. James--Charlevoix District Alone.

Michigan fish hatcheries played an important part in propagating white fish during the last year, regardless of the destruction of the former prolific white fish field in the Detroit River by the digging of the Livingstone channel. That is the showing made in the annual report for 1915 by H. M. Smith, commissioner of the United States bureau of fisheries. The report states that the results accomplished in the Great Lakes hatcheries during the year were generally satisfactory.

"While storms and sudden ice formations hampered fishing operations during the spawning season," says Mr. Smith in his report, "the losses in some fields were in most cases compensated for by unusual success in others, and the final outcome of the collecting season was an aggregate of 1,843,493,540 eggs of all species handled, as compared with 1,634,591,880 during the corresponding season of 1914. Of this total 132,000,000 represented eggs of the cisco, or lake herring, the bulk of which were secured in Lakes Ontario and Superior, where the propagation of this desirable fish was undertaken by the bureau for the first time in the fall of 1914. The egg collections of only one species—the common white fish—fell behind those of the previous year, the total shortage in this instance amounting to about 42,000,000. The take of lake trout eggs, on the other hand, was over 8,000,000 in excess of that in 1914 and there was a small gain in the collection of pike-perch eggs over last year.

"The gathering of whitefish spawn for the Michigan station covered a period of two months, beginning October 14. Field stations for the purpose were located, as heretofore, in Detroit River, Saginaw Bay and the upper part of Lake Michigan. Owing to unfavorable natural conditions, the work was only partially successful. Spawning fish were noticeably scarce everywhere, and especially was this true in the Saginaw Bay district, ordinarily accounted one of the most prolific sources for whitefish eggs. The work in this field was also hampered by violent winds and ice formation, which made it impossible for some of the fishermen to attend their nets during as long a period as nine days near the height of the season. The whole Saginaw Bay field is so much exposed that successful whitefish work is dependent almost entirely on weather conditions.

"The former prolific fishing grounds at Grassy Island in Detroit River, which have been available for the bureau's operations since 1899, have now been destroyed by the dredging operations of the government for the opening of a deep waterway. At Belle Isle, the only remaining whitefish field in this river, fishing was conducted under the supervision of the state warden, who sold the stripped fish to defray the expense of his work.

"The following table shows the field stations operated in Michigan waters, the period of operations and the number of whitefish eggs secured at each:

LOCALITY AND SEASON	NUMBER
Belle Isle, Detroit River, October 25-December 8	27,310,000
Charity Island, Saginaw Bay, October 14-December 2	35,290,000

Incidental to the whitefish operations 6,330,000 lake herring eggs were taken and hatched, the output of fry numbering 3,400,000.

GIVE WAGES A BOOST

Boyer City Chemical Company Restores Old Scale to Its Employees.

The Boyer City Chemical Company, which made an eight per cent cut in wages September 1, 1914, because business was slack, has begun the new year by not only restoring the employees' wages to the 100 per cent basis but has added an extra eight per cent on top of that. The additional amount is to continue until the company has refunded to the employees the difference between the regular and reduced scale of wage. The pay roll of the plant is about $8,000 per month and the sixteen per cent addition will distribute approximately $1,280 per month more.

After the difference has been made up, the wages will be restored to the figure that prevailed before the cut. While some of the workmen may have said "This is so sudden," none of them asked for time to consider the acceptance of the offer.

Special Service at M. E. Church.

"Divine vs. Human Healing." By request the pastor will preach on the time, place and command of Christ that human agencies should be used instead of direct Divine power alone in healing the body. Bring your Bibles.

Bay Port, Saginaw Bay, November 9-November 21	190,000
Naukaway, Lake Michigan, November 16-December 2	10,000,000
Saint James and Charlevoix, Lake Michigan, December 1-December 15	35,000,000
Total	99,000,000

"As the egg collections were not equal to the available hatching facilities, the shortage was made up by the transfer of 117,800,000 eggs to the Detroit hatchery from the collecting field in Lake Erie near Monroes, Michigan. An assignment of 6,000,000 was deducted from the stock on hand for shipment to the Wisconsin fish commission and 49,280,000 eggs failed to develop. On reaching the eyed stage the 162,000,000 constituting the remainder were subdivided, 70,000,000 being retained at Detroit and the remainder forwarded to the auxiliary hatcheries in Northern Michigan to be hatched in connection with the lake trout eggs elsewhere referred to.

"Pike-perch egg collections in Michigan waters were confined to the field off Bay City in Saginaw Bay, the work extending over the last half of April and yielding 102,600,000 eggs. Of these 20,000,000 were shipped green to the Duluth hatchery and 12,500,000 fry were hatched and planted in various waters in the state.

"The whitefish propagation in Lake Erie was satisfactory. A scarcity of fish occurred in the Put-in-Bay field and there was a shortage in the catch at Monroe Piers owing to the destruction of some of the fishermen's nets by floating fields of ice at the height of the spawning season. The take of eggs in all other fields in this lake was greater than ever before and the yield from some of them was twice that of the preceding year. While the aggregate egg collections, amounting to 479,290,000, were nearly 10,000,000 less than in 1914, their quality was so good that there was a decided increase in the whitefish output of the Put-in-Bay station. The superior quality of the eggs is attributed partly to the supervision of the operations of the commercial fishermen by the Michigan fish wardens, who were constantly on the grounds during the spawning season, and partly to a change in the method of handling unripe fish. Heretofore it has been customary to hold large numbers of immature whitefish in pens on the spawning grounds for the ripening of their eggs, and it has been noted that a considerable per cent of the fish so held became affected by a condition known as "plugging," whereby no eggs were secured from them. This year it was determined to place no fish in the pens until they were nearly ready to spawn, and the results of this change in method were clearly apparent, the eggs not only being of a finer grade, but the average yield per fish being larger than under the old system. The output from the Put-in-Bay station included shipments of green and eyed eggs to the number of 235,700,000 and the liberation of 209,000,000 vigorous fry in the waters of Lake Erie.

Incidental to the whitefish operations 6,330,000 lake herring eggs were taken and hatched, the output of fry numbering 3,400,000.

W. C. T. U. MEETING

To Be Held at Home of Mr. and Mrs. A. Edwards January 20th.

The next regular meeting of the Charlevoix W. C. T. U. will be held with Mr. and Mrs. A. Edwards at their home on May street Thursday, January 20th.

Conveyances will be furnished by Mr. Edwards, leaving from the homes of Mrs. N. A. Shores, Mrs. W. J. Weikel and Mrs. S. A. Correll and the Ivy Drug Store at 2:00 o'clock sharp on the day of the meeting. People desiring to take advantage of the rigs furnished must be at one of the above-mentioned places at the hour named.

The usual program will be a feature of the meeting, which will be followed by a potluck supper.

Wedding Anniversary.

A party of about thirty took Mr. and Mrs. George A. Dennis by surprise last Saturday evening, it being their twenty-fifth wedding anniversary. A potluck supper was served, after which the party was entertained with recitations, songs and music by different members of the party. Games were played, after which Mr. Dennis treated the crowd to popcorn. A number of valuable gifts were received, which were greatly appreciated. After a midnight lunch was served all departed wishing Mr. and Mrs. Dennis many more happy and prosperous years.

CONDITION OF MICHIGAN CROPS

Wheat Generally Reported to be in Good Shape.

Price Lower Now Than One Year Ago—Corn Five Cents Per Bushel Higher.

In answer to the question, "Has wheat during December suffered injury from any cause," 21 correspondents in that State answer "Yes" and 394 "No," and in answer to the question "Has the ground been well covered with snow during December," 311 correspondents throughout the state answer "Yes," and 108 "No."

The total number of bushels of wheat marketed by farmers in December at 70 flouring mills was 176,269 and at 74 elevators and to grain dealers 138,390 or a total of 314,659 bushels. Of this amount 207,696 bushels were marketed in the southern four tiers of counties, 87,726 in the central counties and 19,237 in the northern counties and Upper Peninsula. The estimated total number of bushels of wheat marketed in the five months, August-December, was 1,500,000.

Thirty-one mills, elevators and grain dealers report no wheat marketed in December.

The average condition of live stock in the State is reported as follows, comparison being made with stock in good, healthy and thrifty condition: Horses and sheep 97, cattle 96 and swine 94.

The average prices for the State on January 1st of some of the principal farm products were as follows: Wheat per bushel was $1.06; rye 87 cents; corn 73 cents; oats 39 cents; hay per ton was $12.07; fat cattle was $5.93 per cwt.; fat hogs $6.10 per cwt., and dressed pork $8.18 per cwt.

The price of each class of horses was as follows: Under one year old $50.90; between one and two years old $80.20; between two and three years old $118.49 and three years old and over $156.47. Milch cows were worth $58.16 per head. Cattle other than milch cows, under one year old $18.00; between one and two years old $29.09 between two and three years old $44.24 and three years old and over $55.43.

Sheep under one year $4.68 and one year old and over $5.51.

Hogs not fatten $5.42 per cwt. The price of wheat is 3 cents and rye and oats 7 cents lower than one year ago and corn 5 cents higher.

The average prices of horses, etc., one year ago were as follows: Under one year old $51.24; between one and two years old $89.44; between two and three years old $130.16 and three years old over $167.60. Milch cows were worth $62.18 per head. Cattle other than milch cows, under one year old $18.50; between one and two years old $32.24; between two and three years old $47.42 and three years old and over $65.90. Sheep under one year old $4.19 and one year old and over $5.15. Hogs not fattened $6.15 per cwt.

WANTS SEPARATE STATEHOOD

Upper Peninsula of Michigan With Its Fifteen Counties

Soon to Commence Fight to Add Forty-ninth Star to American Flag.

The 49th star in the American flag, representing the great commonwealth of Superior, was in prospect Thursday last, following an address made the night before by Roger M. Andrews of Menominee at the annual banquet of the Calumet Business Men's Association. A vigorous campaign, which will be carried on during 1916, was launched at the banquet. Mr. Andrews predicted that the campaign will soon result in a separate statehood for the 15 counties in the upper peninsula of Michigan, which are geographically separated from the lower peninsula and which were ceded to Michigan by congress in 1837 in settlement of the Ohio boundary dispute. Mr. Andrews pointed out that: The upper peninsula comprises nearly one-third of the State of Michigan, the largest state excepting Georgia east of the Mississippi.

The upper peninsula at no place touches the lower peninsula, but is bounded by its thousand miles of lake shore, touching three of the five great lakes and 180 miles of border line adjoining Wisconsin.

The one-ninth of Michigan's population residing in the upper peninsula pays nearly one-seventh of the state taxes.

The upper peninsula is larger than Delaware, Massachusetts and Connecticut combined, and 13 times as large as Rhode Island.

Employed in the upper peninsula are more wage-earners than in Nebraska, Kansas, Vermont or 12 other states. About 7,000,000 acres are now being turned into profitable farm land.

"There is no reason why this great empire of the upper peninsula—rich in every natural gift, endowed by nature beyond so many of these United States, a center of industrial activity, the home of a third of million persons—should not take its rightful place among the states of the union," said Mr. Andrews in conclusion. "There is room for another star in the flag, and that star should and will represent the State of Superior."

At the Majestic.

A world-wide excursion starting from the Majestic Theatre on Wednesday, February 2nd, and returning in two and a half hours will be made, of course, via Lyman H. Howe's Travel Festival, since that is the only medium before the public whereby such a comprehensive trip may be made in so short a time. The new itinerary will take "Howe tourists" to Madeira, France, Holland, Scotland and Italy, through Switzerland in winter and over the trails of our Glacier National Park, and give hundreds of thousands of motorists their first clear conception of how a modern automobile is made, as seen at the immense plant of the Willys-Overland Company at Toledo. Besides there will be a ride in an aeroplane, exciting scenes of a torpedo boat struggling through a terrific gale on the high seas, nature studies of absorbing interest and charm, as well as entirely new comedy cartoons.

THOSE SUDDEN TWINGES

Bring Suffering to Many a Charlevoix Reader.

Pain is nature's signal of distress. A warning not to be ignored. Those sharp twinges in the back—Those sudden, stab-like pains when stooping.

Are frequent signs of kidney trouble; Signs that must not be neglected. To remove kidney pains, you must assist the kidneys.

Use a tested and proven kidney remedy.

None more highly endorsed than Doan's Kidney Pills.

Mrs. Ophalia Davey, Ellsworth, Michigan, says: "I suffered from kidney trouble for some time. I had pain in the small of my back and twinges when stooping or lifting. My back ached at night and was lame in the morning. I tired easily, was languid and nervous and had headaches. The kidney secretions were unnatural. I finally took Doan's Kidney Pills and they helped me at once."

Price 50c. at all dealers. Don't simply ask for a kidney remedy—get Doan's Kidney Pills—the same that Mrs. Davey had. Foster-Milburn Co., Props., Buffalo, N. Y.

Suffrage Notes

The equal suffrage amendment has again been introduced in congress. In the suffrage states and those in which the question has been voted on recently the total favorable vote is overwhelmingly strong. The figures are as follows:

Total popular suffrage vote in twenty-one states 6,511,595
Popular vote of President Wilson in 1912 in forty-eight states 6,293,019

When the demand for equal suffrage on the part of voters exceeds the popular presidential vote by over 200,000, as in this case, it is time for congress to act. The question has become a national issue.

In consequence of woman suffrage our elections are more orderly and fair, a higher class of officers are chosen, and we have cleaner and stronger city governments.—Chief Justice Johnston of Kansas.

An anti-suffrage "argument" is that women should not vote because they do not fight. To this Lucy Stone answered: "Some woman risks her life when ever a soldier is born into the world. Later she does picket duty over his cradle, and for years she is his quartermaster and gathers his rations, and when that boy grows to be a man shall he say to his mother: 'If you want to vote you must first go and kill somebody.' It is a coward's argument."

Little Walter, whose father is a professor in a middle west university, was scrutinizing his parents closely and said: "Father, you have such heavy eyebrows and mother has hardly any! What are eyebrows for?" The father replied promptly: "Why, eyebrows are—er—eyebrows—they are to keep the sweat from getting into people's eyes when they work hard." "But, father," protested Walter, "I don't Rheumatism and lumbago are awful things and cause great pain and misery, but Foley Kidney Pills can cure them.

Mrs. G. H. Eveland, Duncan Mills, Ill., writes the following letter: "I was stricken down with lumbago and was unable to turn myself in bed. A neighbor brought me a half bottle of Foley Kidney Pills, and said she had been similarly afflicted and that they had helped her. So I tried them and was completely relieved by the use of two or three bottles. I have had splendid success with them and have never known them to fail. I most heartily recommend Foley Kidney Pills."

ROTTERDAM CLOVER IN FIELD

It is a common practice for farmers who grow clover for seed to allow the clover to rot for several weeks after cutting before the seed is sown or drawn to the barn. Sometimes red clover cut early is allowed to lie in the swaths or windrows for six or eight weeks, exposed to all kinds of climatic conditions. Clover stacks that are poorly constructed or unprotected frequently become wet and musty. Sometimes in wet portions of the stack the clover will even become black and largely decompose before the seed is hauled. The result of this exposure is seen in the swelling and sometimes germination of those seeds which are not protected by hard seed coats. Even if the seeds do not germinate, if once they have become thoroughly swollen, even though subsequently dried, they are of no value. Seeds should be thoroughly dried in the barn when cut. If the cut clover is rained upon before it has had time to dry a great many of the seeds will be destroyed. Better Farming.

ADVANTAGES OF SILOS.

Good Silage is the Best Meat and Milk Producing Roughage Known.

On account of the backward season there will be a large amount of soft corn unless the present damp summer is followed by an unusually warm fall. Soft corn means a very serious loss to the farmer who depends on corn for his cash crop. To the dairy farmer the loss is not great provided he has a silo. Corn that is overtaken by frost when in the milk stage will make a fairly good quality of silage if it is put into the silo at once.

This, according to W. E. Markey of the College of Agriculture of the University of Wisconsin, is the pressing reason for a silo on every farm this year. Several other silo reasons, however, are enumerated by Mr. Markey.

The silo furnishes succulent, palatable feed of uniform quality that is always near at hand. In addition to high food value silage supplies succulence, which makes it easily digestible and keeps the systems of the cows toned up. This tends to provide immediate results in a full milk flow.

The silo preserves the corn crop with the minimum amount of loss, as the entire plant is made fit for food. It increases the number of cows that can be kept on a given number of acres. This has been estimated at double the number possible without a silo.

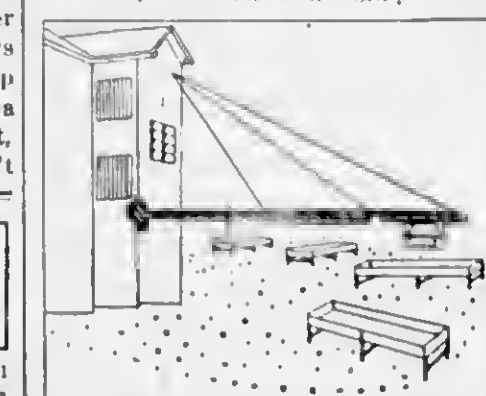

It economizes space, time and building costs in storage. The entire crop can be stored in a short time at a relatively low labor cost in about one third of the space required to store an equal amount of food value in the form of hay.

Silage makes the most economical convenient feed for supplementing short pastures during a period of drought. A silo equalizes the supply of feed by carrying it over in good condition from one year to another. Cases are on record where silage has kept in perfect condition for several years.

A silo can be used for ensiling clover or alfalfa during a spell of wet weather or when it would be impossible to cure it for hay.

Silage Carrier.

The Nebraska experiment station in its bulletin No. 115 describes in detail the ensilage carrier shown here. It is adapted to average sized and small feeding yards and is a highly useful and labor-saving arrangement. The beam or arm to which the carrier is attached must be strongly attached and guyed. The feeding racks are arranged in a semicircle that brings them just under the tip of the arm.

An Eye Experiment.

The two eyes really see two objects. If the two forefingers be held, one at the distance of one foot and the other two feet, in front of the eyes and the former be looked at, two phantoms of the latter will be observed, one on each side. If the latter figure be regarded two phantoms of the nearest finger will be observed mounting guard, one on either side.

COUNTY NORMAL.

(Hazel Richardson)

School opened again Wednesday morning with every member present, after spending the holidays at their homes.

School Commissioner May L. Stewart visited the normal room Friday morning and gave us a short talk on the work being done in the county towards establishing standard schools.

Miss Ethel Sanford, graduate of last year's class, who is now teaching in Emmet county, visited the normal class Friday morning. She gave a very interesting account of the work which she is doing in her school.

Thursday the class attended a meeting of the school officers of the county. In the morning the new school laws were discussed. In the afternoon a very interesting talk was given by Mr. Otwell on "The Standard School." Everyone present enjoyed the meeting and received some very helpful ideas.

Burgess School

(Alice Chew, Editor.)

Elmer Radle is attending our school now.

Agnes Armstrong went to Petoskey one day last week.

The seventh grade are studying "The Life of Benjamin Franklin."

The eighth grade is taking up the study of agriculture this month.

A good crowd was out to Sunday school and we hope more will attend.

School was not so well attended last month on account of so many persons having to gripe.

Mrs. Schantz and daughter Minnie returned home Monday from their trip to Battle Creek and Detroit.

A number of the seventh graders are planning on taking the county eighth grade examinations in the spring.

We have decided to feed the birds and have put our Christmas tree up in the yard to put the food on for them.

The following persons have had perfect spelling lessons the last month: Fifth grade, Alvin Newson; 7th grade, Alice Chew; 8th grade, Pearl Gregory.

The following persons have not been absent or tardy for four months: Edith Baker, Willis Gregory, George Brown, Whitford Armstrong, Verne Brown, Agnes Armstrong, Eva Ostrum and Inez Armstrong.

Johnson School District

(Bertha Smith)

School started January 3, after a two week's vacation.

Miss Grace Sink visited school last Thursday morning.

There were quite a few absent from school last week on account of la grippe.

The chart class and first and second grades have been dramatizing the story of "The Little Red Hen" for language work.

The third grade has been learning arithmetic in a practical way by playing store with toy money. In this way the different coins become familiar to them and they learn how to make change.

HOPYARD

Bound to Win.

Della Peaslee is editor this week.

We are in school again after a week's vacation.

Alice Burns was a visitor at the school Monday.

We received our pennant from our teacher for Xmas.

Sylvester Fay of Charlevoix is attending our school now.

Miss Srigley spent her vacation at home, sick with the gripp.

George O'Brien is hauling a supply of wood to the school this week.

Ralph Burns was absent from school Monday on account of illness.

The chart class and second grade are acting as housekeepers this week.

The second grade have been dramatizing Little Red Ridinghood in reading.

Alexander and Peter Winnick and George Haggerty were absent this week.

G. M. Stocum and family of Central Lake are spending a week with Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Burns.

NOWLAND SCHOOL NOTES

Marie Mitchell was absent this week.

Orlin Cunningham was absent Friday because of illness.

Wm. Williams' children were absent this week because of illness.

Albert and Winnifred Cunningham are not yet able to return to school.

The stormy weather Thursday kept Dorothy and Katie McClanathan also Russell Shaw from school.

Effie Shaw has been unable to attend school during the past week because her mother is away visiting in Indiana.

School began Monday after one week's vacation with only eight pupils.

LaGrippe is detaining nearly all of the others.

"Finest Cathartic I Ever Used"

"They do not gripe and their effect is quick and sure"—says L. L. Levey.

"For a long time I suffered from constipation and liver trouble," says Mr. L. L. Levey of Green Bay, Wis. "Nothing seemed to help me. I finally secured a package of Foley Cathartic Tablets and am pleased to state that they have cured me. They are the finest cathartic I have ever used, as they do not gripe at all and their effect is quick and sure."

If you are at all troubled with constipation, Foley Cathartic Tablets will be a blessing to you—they not only induce natural, comfortable movement, but they have a strengthening and beneficial effect upon the intestinal tract.

Foley Cathartic Tablets can safely be taken by any and every member of your family. Like all Foley remedies they are sold in yellow packages. Accept nothing but the genuine.

Sold Everywhere.

Those who were neither absent nor tardy during the past four months received a large certificate of award which is engraved in a wild rose design and the county seal is stamped in the lower left hand corner.

We were pleased to have so many of the parents and friends with us during the afternoon when we gave our Christmas program. It showed us that they are all much interested in the work we are doing here.

There are nine from our school who received the large certificates. They are Frank Nowland, Alvin Cunningham, Beatrice Williams, Dorothy McClanathan, Greathel Williams, Dora Williams, Katie McClanathan, Flossie Williams and Revella Williams.

Those who received certificates of award for the month of December were Beatrice Williams, Greathel Williams, Dorothy McClanathan, Flossie Williams, Katie McClanathan, Frank Nowland, Earl Williams, Effie Shaw, Revella Williams, Russell Shaw, Alvin Cunningham, Dora Williams and Orlin Cunningham.

A Perfect Example.

The paper speaks of a certain argument as being tactfully yet forcefully phrased," said the young student. "What would be a good example of that?"

"My son," returned the father, "can it be you have never lent ear to your mother's able representations on the periodical occasions when I return home on pay day?"

POULTRY and EGGS

PROFIT IN TURKEYS.

Poultry Gives Better Returns Than Any Other Kind of Live Stock.

[Prepared by United States department of agriculture.]

When properly handled there is no other kind of live stock which will return so large a profit to the successful producer as poultry, and no other kind of poultry is so profitable as turkeys.

Turkeys pick up much of their food on the range from the time they are six weeks old until winter sets in and during this period are kept at little or no cost to the grower. They may at most be termed self sustaining foragers when they have sufficient range.

The chance for profit in the production of turkeys is gradually improving as a result of a more general use of the flesh. They are now used not only for roasting, but to an increasing extent as cold cuts for sandwiches and for salads, and large numbers of poulters are used for broilers. Late hatched poulters do well for this purpose, and while there cannot be much opportunity for growing poulters to maturity when they are hatched late in the season, they may be sold for broilers at a good profit. No dish is more valued in our large cities at the present time than the broiled poult.

Turkeys that are hatched early in the spring should grow to weigh from fourteen to twenty pounds by Thanksgiving week. These weights are often exceeded by the best growers, but, as they are the most popular and most readily produced, they are suggested as the most advisable. The average yield of turkey hens is from eighteen to thirty eggs, each of which can usually be coulted on to produce a living poult. The question of profit from keeping turkeys simply resolves itself into the ability of the grower to bring them to a marketable size. This can readily be done if care and attention be given to all the requirements for success.

Six standard varieties of turkeys are more or less grown in this country—viz., Bronze, Narragansett, Buff, Slate, White and Black. The main differences are in size and color of plumage. The Bronze and the Narragansett are the largest, the Buff and Slate are the medium and the Black and White the smallest. Of late so much improvement in size has been made in the Whites that they have moved up to contend for third position, some of them having passed the thirty pound mark. The same statement may soon be made of the Blacks, as they have greatly improved during the last five years.

In addition to the foregoing there is a standard variety known as the Bourbon Red. They might well hold the position now held by the Buff turkeys, being quite like them and more largely grown for market than are the Buffs. There is scarcely enough preference shown in the open market for any one of these varieties for table use to cause it to be favored in production of turkeys for market. There is, however, a strong preference at all times for the best grown and best finished specimens of all varieties. In Rhode Island, where the highest quality is produced, there does not seem to be much preference for any particular variety.

GRAVEL ROADS IN IOWA.

Have Proved Satisfactory, as Is Exemplified by Greene County Highways.

The question of surfacing roads is being given more than the usual share of attention this year throughout the length and breadth of the corn belt because of the impassable condition of highways in many localities, due to the abnormal rainfall, says the Iowa Housestead. Automobile owners are literally up in arms over the present system of roadmaking, and of course in the corn belt these are numbered by the hundreds of thousands at the present time. The number is being rapidly supplemented by farmers, who are complaining of their inability to market produce under favorable conditions, and, all in all, the agitation is directing special attention to ways and means of improving dirt roads in some other fashion than that of dragging them.

Because of the attention given to the subject it is interesting to turn to the example of one county in Iowa, where there are 100 miles of good gravel roads. This system of roadmaking, which has been in evidence in Greene county for many years, has given to that county a reputation which extends far beyond the boundary of the state.

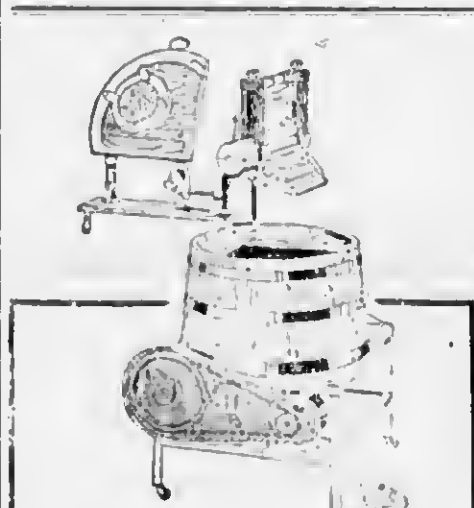

In the making of these roads a good grade is first thrown up, and afterward an eight inch coating of gravel is placed in the center of the highway. It requires approximately 2,200 yards per mile of finished road, and most of this has been put in place at a cost of 75 cents per yard. This cost includes the leveling of the gravel to a width of eight feet in the center of the road, and in addition the amount mentioned will make a strip four inches deep, four feet wide on each side of the more heavily gravelled strip. This means that sixteen feet of the highway is surfaced in such a way that it makes a firm roadbed, one that will stand all reasonable traffic in all kinds of weather.

It is not herein intimated that the example of Greene county can be followed in every county, because of the lack of similar surfacing materials. However, the experience thus far in that county indicates that enthusiasm for surfaced roads, very rapidly spreads. A ten mile strip will be gravelled this year, and satisfactory as this has been, there is some sentiment being created in the country favorable to the use of a more permanent material, such as concrete or brick.

The supposed advantage of these materials over that of gravel is that for a series of years there will be no maintenance cost, whereas in the case of gravel there is more or less patching and repaving work required every season.

Hats Off to the Flag.

"The greatest tribute I ever saw paid to the stars and stripes," says Colonel Payson Bradley, past commander of the Massachusetts Grand Army, "was not on American soil. When the Ancient and Honorable Artillery landed at Liverpool on its visit to England in 1896 the line of march was crowded with over 100,000 persons. When we unfolded Old Glory we were struck with surprise at the cheers which went up from those English people. As we marched along every man, from the Prince of Wales to the lowest boot-black, took off his hat while the stars and stripes passed. I would like to see that happen once in Boston or New York before I die."—Boston Record.

FEASTING and dancing, gaiety and laughter are promised to Washington society when President Wilson and the new First Lady of the Land return from their Hot Springs honeymoon. "Eat, drink, and be merry, for to-morrow we officially expire," is the quotation on the lips of the quadrennial aristocracy at the Capital which every twenty years or more is made up of Democratic officeholders and their families. The White House will be a blaze of illumination and will vibrate to the street strains of the Marine Band Orchestra as the merry dancers clasp in the grape-juice grapple, or caper in the Woodrow wriggle. "On with the dance; let joy be unconfined!"

The members of the cabinet will vie with the members of the senate in the display of lavish hospitality. It is even rumored that, now Bryan is out and Daniels turned militant, a little wine will be served, at least to the diplomatic set, because they are used to it and know how to handle it, you understand. There will be sounds of revelry by night and the buzz of gossip by day.

So suddenly did the announcement come that President Wilson and the new mistress of the White House would put away dull care and seek deluding joys, that the official haut monde has hardly had time to prepare a program of the season's events, and now there is a grand scramble for gowns and gewgaws, engraved cards and open dates. The shop-window displays of milady's millinery and lingerie are beautiful to behold; vintners are laying in new stocks of old vintages; jewelers are exhibiting new designs; theatrical and operatic stars and musicians are being booked for private entertainments. The wife of one cabinet officer is said to have written a couple of playlets which will be produced before select audiences. History and mythology are being ransacked for characters to be represented at fancy dress balls. Debutantes will bloom like dandelions in the warm spring s o d. Altogether the season promises to be a hummer.

The gala day feeling in Washington this year is in marked contrast with the puritanical expression which the city assumed when President Wilson was inaugurated in 1913. The usual preparations had been made that year for the inaugural ball, when, right in the midst of them, came the decision of President Wilson that there would be no ball; that his was to be an administration of Jeffersonian simplicity; that the office of chief magistrate was one of such grave responsibility as to preclude his entry into the social whirl. So society put away its silks and satins and donned linen-woolsey and became sedate. All receptions and jollifications were tabooed.

But, pshaw! "When a man comes to himself," society came into its own. Hence it is decreed that this, the last presidential year of Mr. Wilson, shall, in the memory of his Democratic courtiers, be the first. "Praising what is lost makes the remembrance dear."

The Miser Of Havelock

How the Name Was Changed to "Prince of Havelock."

By CLARISSA MACKIE

Sally Birch glanced curiously at the house set back among the drooping elms. Her aunt saw the glance and talked volubly.

"You remember I've written you about the man who has taken the old Havelock place?"

"Yes," replied Sally. "You called him an old miser. Really, Aunt Jane, does he count his gold in a dusty, cobwebbed room?"

"Fiddle!" snorted June Gray. "Of course he doesn't do that! But he is so stingy he won't give a cent toward any charity, and he even stays away from church. Folks say he is too mean to put a penny in the contribution box."

Sally laughed indulgently. "Poor old man!" she said. "If he really knew what his neighbors said about him do you suppose he would summon pride to his aid and give something?"

"I'm sure he would not," asserted Jane, with emphasis. "He's been approached by every one. I even went there myself!"

"And he refused?" asked Sally.

"Yes. He said, 'Madam, if I could see my way clear to contribute toward your church expenses I would do so, but I cannot afford it.' I said to him, 'Mr. Worth, don't conceal your miserably nature behind a lie. Any one who can afford to rent the Havelock place must be a rich man.'"

"What did he say then?" questioned Sally.

"He grew very red, and I don't wonder, and he said nothing whatever, for I didn't give him an opportunity. I came away."

Sally glanced once more through the gateway. There was a garbier now in the velvet lawns. From over the hedge came the rich, sweet smell of lily of the valley.

"When I was a little girl I used to slip inside the gate and pick lilies of the valley," said Sally reminiscently.

"That was when the Havelocks lived here," interposed Jane. "There have been many changes since you came to visit me fifteen years ago. The Havelocks have become millionaires and rarely come to Lymbrook. I was surprised to learn they had rented the place."

Sally's blue eyes watched the vanishing form of the garbier. The clatter of the lawn mower died away in the distance.

"You go on, Aunt Jane," said the girl. "I'm going to get some lilies. I shall be home almost as soon as you are." She added as the trim little lady protested, "Even if he is a miser I am sure old Mr. Worth won't mind my having a few flowers. Probably he doesn't know they're here at all. I'm sure buttercups and dandelions are his favorite blossoms. They're the color of gold, you know."

Sally waved a laughing farewell and slipped through an opening in the tall clipped hedge.

"Oh!" she cried sharply, for a man confronted her.

He was sitting back on his heels among the stiff green leaves of the lily bed, and in his hand was a great bunch of the fragrant flowers.

There was hardly a dainty blossom left in the bed.

He was a very tired-looking man, with quite gray hair. His eyes were brown and his eyebrows very black, meeting symmetrically on the bridge of a very handsome nose.

He glanced coolly at Sally, and she was conscious that the brown eyes did not disapprove of her dainty self.

Her usually sweet voice became very cold and contemptuous.

"I came in to get a few lilies," she said as he rose to his full height. "I am sure Mr. Worth would not care, he has so many."

"My name is Worth," he said, looking keenly at her.

"You?" she cried incredulously. "Then you heard what we were saying about your father, I suppose?"

He nodded. "My father has been dead for three years." A look of pain crossed his features and vanished in a grim smile. "I am James Worth, I am the miser of Havelock."

Sally's face was crimson with embarrassment, but she lifted a laughing lip.

"You listened!" she accused.

"I couldn't help it. These lilies had to be picked. I have promised them by noon. They are for Miss Trent's wedding bouquet. You see, I am explaining why I cannot give them to you."

"Ah, no! But I am glad that you do not mind my trespassing," she said hastily.

"I am afraid I would have objected to your taking my flowers," he said coolly. "You see, I am to be well paid for this bouquet. I could not afford to give them away."

The contemptuous look came back to Sally's eyes.

"Of course not!" She moved toward the open gate. It would be too unkind to squeeze through his hedge again. The situation required a conventional exit.

But fate ordained otherwise. Something crunched under her little white shoes.

"My hat!" he cried tragically.

Sally dashed the tears away and exulted her foot from the ruined hat. She noticed that it was not a new hat, but a primrose heart covering of the season before.

Sally had almost reached Aunt Jane's house when she murmured:

"How white he was. He must have a frightful temper. And all about a lost year's hat!"

But she dismissed the unpleasant incident for the time because Aunt Jane was fruitfully preparing for Agatha Trent's wedding.

For several days Sally Birch evinced an unusual restlessness. No longer was she content to sit on the vine draped piazza and read or embroider. To Jane Gray's disgust Sally took to walking.

"My dear," fussed the little woman. "I can't follow you about the country over hill and dale, and it really isn't safe for you to go alone."

"I always take Cuesar along," protested Sally.

"Cuesar is all very well," retorted Jane, patting the French bull pup "but after this don't go any further than the pine woods."

Sally agreed, blushing hotly, for how could she explain to Aunt Jane, narrow minded and prejudiced, that the Havelock pine woods had been the Mecca of her daily walk? Aunt Jane could not be made to understand that Sally felt that she owed James Worth the "miser of Havelock" an apology for her rudeness.

So Sally and Cuesar went to the pine woods once more, and for the first time since that May morning when she had slipped through his hedge she met the "miser of Havelock."

He was standing under the pines listening to the song of a wood thrush. He was bareheaded, and Sally remembered, with a guilty pang, Aunt Jane's idle gossip that the "miser" had taken to going bareheaded about the country since.

He heard Cuesar's pattering tread on the pine needles and turned his head just as Sally came to a pause, looking like a lovely picture in her pink frock. The sunlight slanted down and touched her brown hair with golden lights. Her eyes were as blue as the unclouded sky.

"Good afternoon," he said gravely, and without waiting for an exchange of courtesies he looked up to the top of the tree where the thrush was silhouetted against the sky.

"Mr. Worth," began Sally timidly. "I've been wanting to see you—to tell you I'm sorry about the hat."

His eyes looked so surprised that Sally's heart jumped oddly, just as it had said: "Why, this girl is much nicer than I thought! She isn't such a barbarian, after all!"

He smiled, too, and ten years vanished. Surely he was not more than thirty. He looked very boyish.

"I don't trouble about the wretched hat," he said. "I'm sorry I acted so panic stricken over it, but—ne laughed outright—"It was a very serious matter."

"I am sorry. I was very rude about it and about the flowers," she added.

"Would it bore you if I told you why I am called a miser?" He hesitated.

A lovely look came into Sally's eyes. "I would feel honored by your confidence," she said quite humbly.

He found a seat for her on a fallen log, and, sitting down on the pine needles, he stuffed his pipe into his pocket and began.

Sally listened, fascinated, to a story of how a man, his father, had failed in business. In the crash carrying to ruin a number of his customers, men of small means who had trusted him.

Almost immediately he had died, and on his deathbed his son had promised to pay back every creditor and clear his father's name.

To him it was a sacred trust, and he had paid up the debts, devoting himself to hard work and even necessities. Dick Havelock had been his college classmate, and last year Dick had offered his friend the use of the country house, with the privilege of selling fruits and flowers, while he saw that the place was kept in repair.

James Worth was a writer who was struggling toward success. He had just completed a novel, it had been accepted by publishers, and a substantial check was in his pocket.

"I am happy today," he concluded frankly. "This check will pay off the last indebtedness against my father's name."

"I am so glad for you," said Sally softly, "and thank you for telling me. I wish every one knew that the 'miser of Havelock' is a nobleman in disguise."

"Oh," he cried, in embarrassment, "I only told you because I—I didn't want you to misunderstand. Any decent chap would have done the same thing."

"You will be going away?" she asked.

He nodded. "Tomorrow. Wait a moment, please." He disappeared among the trees.

Sally waited ten minutes, and then he returned, bearing a small bunch of lilies of the valley.

"These have been coming into bloom in the darkest corner under the hedge," he explained. "I was hoping I would see you again. I was saving them for you."

Sally ploned them at her breast.

"I felt so mean about the others," he confessed. "But I got $25 for that bouquet, and it helped a lot. You understand now?"

Sally smiled. "I understand," she said and gave him her hand in farewell.

"Good luck," she wished him.

"Oh, I shall be coming back to see you," he said.

And who can blame Sally Worth if she does call her husband the "Prince of Havelock" sometimes? Usually, though, she calls him "Jimmy."

GOOD ROADS AND FARMERS.

It costs more for the farmers of America to carry their crops to the railroad station than it costs to carry these crops from the railroad stations to the central market.

These prices are not always shown in the price list or in the statement of annual expenditures, but they are facts nevertheless, and it behooves the farmer therefore to see to it that this item in the expense of marketing is reduced to a minimum.

Let him have a good road all the year round, so that he can do a great part of his hauling to the railroad station and away from it at periods of the year when he can do very little farm work.—Home and Farm.

FACTOR IN COMMUNITY LIFE.

United States Just Beginning to Realize Importance of Better Highways.

No single factor plays such an important part in the social and business life of a community as the quality of its roads. Aside from the pleasure and convenience of travel possible at all times over permanent roads, there is the financial phase which directly concerns the cost not only of farm produce, but of city products as well; consequently everybody wants good roads. In the matter of paying for permanent highways a generally satisfactory agreement seems to have been reached in the proposed distribution of the cost between the nation, the state, the county and the users of the road in question. As a result within a few years this country will take its rightful leading position among the nations of the world in the number of miles of permanent roads.

In a way it is fortunate that the United States has been rather slow in the matter of roadmaking. The roads can now be built of lasting materials, such as will withstand the wear of motor traffic, which is fast riding Europe's century old roadways. Lasting road materials are everywhere present in the form of sand and gravel from pits and stream beds and crushed rock from stone quarries. Combined with portland cement into concrete they form an inexpensive and permanent road surface which successfully resists the usually destructive action of automobiles.

The first consideration in the building of concrete roads is a careful study of local deposits of sand, gravel and rock called the aggregate to see whether they are suitable for concrete. Sand must be clean and hard and must grade uniformly in size of grain from one-quarter inch down. The same applies practically to gravel and crushed rock.

There are two phases of the cost of improvement—first cost and upkeep expense. In both items the concrete road has proved less expensive than any other kind of permanent roadway. Of some three million yards of city and country concrete pavements built in recent years the average first cost has been $12.22 a square yard. The annual upkeep expense a mile on these roads has been almost nothing. In Bellefontaine, O., concrete pavements in use eighteen years have cost annually for maintenance only one-quarter of one cent a square yard. Upkeep cost of Wayne county, Mich., country concrete roads for three years has averaged but $2.50 a mile.

In 1911 the mean cost of repairing macadam roads in New York state was $800 a mile—10 per cent of the first cost. If these roads had been concrete, practically all the immense expense could have been saved and used in building new roads instead of repairing old ones. With better roads will come better homes, better churches, happier homes, better business and decreased cost of living.

Many Millions For Roads in a Year. Statistics gathered from the thirty-three states throughout the Union, in which records are carefully compiled, tell an interesting story of what this country is doing to keep its lines of communication from district to district in the best possible condition.

In the thirty-three states there are 1,611,229 roads of all kinds. Of these 226,288 are improved, 35,701 miles have been improved during the year 1914. At the rate of 35,000 miles per year these thirty-three states will have their entire mileage classed under the head of improved road in less than forty-five years. In these states during the year 1914 there were added 6,006 miles of new roads. Before the advent of the automobile such a thing would have been unprecedented, but now it is becoming a yearly occurrence and gathering impetus as time goes on.

These improvements cost $108,191,771. The greatest amount spent by any state was Indiana, which paid out $17,000,000. New York followed closely with $14,638,015; Iowa expended $11,000,000; Colorado spent $9,964,077; Wisconsin paid out $7,000,000; Montana, $8,380,278, and Illinois, $5,500,000.

A Connecting Link. The Grant highway, a road from Chicago to Dubuque, Ia., is to pass through Elgin, Belvidere, Rockford, Freeport, Pearl City, Stockton and Galesburg, Ill., according to petition recently taken by the Grant Highway association. The road is to be marked by a device consisting of a black band between two yellow bands, which is to be painted on every fifth telegraph or telephone pole along the route.

Miss Florence McKee, who just returned from Mt. Pleasant, visited the Star school Tuesday.

A debate was given Tuesday afternoon during the seventh and eighth grade English period by the seventh and eighth grade pupils. The subject being Resolved, if Mr. Ford's ability will help towards peace in the European countries. The affirmative side won. Miss Thorne and Miss McKee acted judges.

The eight grade have taken up the work in Agriculture and Orthography.

The students from the fourth to the eighth grade are learning the words of the Star Spangled Banner and America in connection with their language work.

The Palmer Method in penmanship is being taught in the Star school. Some excellent papers are received each day, and carefully preserved for exhibit at the Charlevoix county fair.

Care of Spring Pullets.

The early hatched pullets should be laying in October and maybe some of them earlier than that. If they have been hatched properly they will be full sized and in the peak of condition by that time. Remember that all pullets should be full grown and matured before they commence to lay. If you try to get pullets to lay before they have attained proper size they will lay, but never get the size and weight you wish. Laying stops their growth to a certain extent. When the pullets are of good size then begin to feed material that will make eggs and do it rapidly. Stimulating foods should not be given, but good, sound grain, with a mash once a day, and plenty of bran and alfalfa in the mash. These pullets should be housed together and without a male bird till the eggs are needed for breeding purposes.—Klaus Farmer

A Londoner was showing some country relative the signs of London one day recently and was pointing out a magnificent old residence, built years ago by a famous and rather unscrupulous lawyer of his time. "And," the Londoner was asked, "was he able to build a house like that by his practice?" "Yes," was the reply, "by his practice and his practices."

SAND-CLAY IN ROADMAKING

Best Methods of Improving Earth Highways.

GREAT VALUE TO FARMERS.

The Office of Public Roads Advises That in Lieu of an Engineer the Farmers Themselves Should Look Over and Attend to the Old Earth Highways.

In view of the fact that at the beginning of the year no less than 90 per cent or approximately 2,000,000 miles of the roads of the country were of the ordinary earth type, it is important that the farmer understand the best methods of improving such roads.

The office of the public roads advises the communities to have an engineer go over the old earth highways, or, in lieu of an engineer, that the farmers themselves should see to it that the roads are so graded that the ditches or gutters are parallel with the center line of the road. Gutters must have a uniform grade and be of sufficient capacity to keep the surface well drained. Drainage is the most important feature of an earth road.

Every farmer who lives in a section where both sand and clay are prevalent travels occasionally over some particular spot in the road which is always good and rarely requires attention from the road hands. Good drainage may be responsible for this condition.

ON AN UNCARVED FOR EARTH ROAD.

tion or it may be found on investigation that there is a good natural mixture of sand and clay forming the wearing surface.

Analysis of the best natural sand clay mixtures will show that the sand forms about 70 per cent of the whole. The test is simple. Weigh into an ordinary medicine glass two ounces of the dried mixture and wash out the clay. Dry the remaining sand and weigh again. The loss in weight will represent the amount of clay originally contained in the mass.

The theory of the sand-clay mixture as a road building material is that the clay fills the voids between the grains of sand, firmly binding them together. After the material is found the process of building the road is simple. Before placing any sand-clay on the road the road should be graded to the desired width. Most engineers prefer to have a width for the road of about twenty feet, exclusive of side ditches, which are each usually about three feet wide. Sand-clay is cheap, and it is best that sixteen feet of the graded width (twenty feet) be surfaced. This will leave a two or three foot shoulder on either side. The surface of the graded road should be flat or slightly convex. The sand-clay should be put on from eight to twelve inches in thickness, depending on the character of the subgrade or foundation. Where you have a hard clay for foundation eight inches of sand-clay will suffice. If the foundation is sand, it is well to put on as much as twelve inches of the surfacing material. After a few hundred feet of surfacing material has been placed a grading machine should be run over it to smooth and crown the road before the top becomes too hard. It is a good plan to turn the blade of the machine out and trim the edges of the surfaced part, discharging the excess sand and clay on to the earth shoulders. After one round trip with the blade turned on the remaining dress work with the machine should be with the blade turned in, with the exception of one trip down the center of the road with blade at right angle to the axis of the road for the purpose of distributing any excess material left in the center.

After the machine work it is well to show with a split bar drag, which removes any rough places left by the machine and leaves the road with a smooth, even surface. It must be born in mind that a sand-clay road, unlike dirt roads, cannot be finished in a short space of time. It can, of course, be left in an apparently finished condition, with a hard, smooth surface, but it will be found on close examination that the hard surface is in reality only a crust, underneath which are several inches of loose material. After the first hard rain the crust softens, the road gets bad and the work appears to be a failure. This, however, is just what is needed to make it eventually good. After the road has dried until in a plastic state it should be dragged until the surface is once more smooth, with the proper crown, and should be kept this way by dragging at least once a day until the sun has baked it hard and firm. The mistake of keeping traffic off during this process of setting should not be made.

SILVER WEDDING

Celebrated at Home of Mr. and Mrs. George A. Dennis Saturday.

On Saturday, January 8th, occurred the 25th wedding anniversary of Mr. and Mrs. G. A. Dennis, west of town. Three sleighloads of visitors—one from Charlevoix, one from Ellsworth and one from East Jordan—gathered at the farm home to help them celebrate the event. The evening was spent in playing old-fashioned games, singing old-fashioned songs, and other like amusements. A bounteous supper was served. Several gifts and a silver collection were presented Mr. and Mrs. Dennis, and at a late hour the guests departed wishing their hosts royal entertainers and wishing them many more anniversaries of their wedded life.

BY FAR THE BEST YET HELD

Blue Hall Filled to Capacity at Board of Trade Banquet.

Judge E. R. Harris Acted as Toastmaster—Dickema's Address Captures Crowd.

Friday night, January 7th, the Blue Store Hall rang with music and laughter as the program of the second annual Board of Trade banquet was reeled off by Toastmaster Judge E. R. Harris.

One hundred and fifty guests were in attendance, consisting of the leading citizens of Banks township and their wives. Invocation was pronounced by Ethan Jolliffe. President VanSkiwer introduced Toastmaster Harris, who performed the office of master of ceremonies with due grace. The music by the East Jordan orchestra of seven pieces delighted all and put music in the souls of each and every one. Too much cannot be said in praising our sister town's fine orchestra under the leadership of Professor Berger.

Thomas D. Meggison, our able county prosecutor, gave a very interesting talk on "Our Township," which was thoroughly enjoyed by all. James Devey (known as Sunny Jim), the popular and efficient county clerk who wins friends by his very presence, gave a very interesting talk.

Otto Powers, the genial piano man, gave two excellent vocal solos, which received the loud applause that comes wherever Mr. Powers' fine voice is heard. The poem by L. K. Clark was very good and enjoyed by all. Ellsworth prides herself on having a real poet all its own.

The address of the evening, delivered by Hon. Gerriet J. Dickema, candidate for governor, was a master-piece, and all agree the best address ever given in our city. Although the address did not concern politics in the least, the people were very much impressed with the man, and many express themselves as very favorable to his candidacy for governor. Everyone agreed that this banquet was by far the best which many ever attended.

DAIRY and CREAMERY

PROFIT IN DAIRYING.

Farmers Who Raise Their Own Feed Make Most From Cows.

Dairying is on the increase. The most unfortunate man is the one who undertakes to dairy without the right kind of feed, and the next unfortunate is the one who depends on buying the cow's ration. Few and far between are the men who have the labor to come from either system, says R. A. Hayne in the National Stockman. One thing that keeps so many folks dairying is the money that comes often and sometimes that the women and children can do most of the work. But when the long hours, early and late, are common and the feed bills are paid it is not a big labor income business. What to do? Raise the feed.

Once spent a week in a dairy country that is becoming the feed dealer's poor because the feed dealer got the milk checks and in a land where soy beans grow to perfection and clover and alfalfa thrive with a little time and phosphorus. At every farm were piles of feed sacks, the contents bought to balance the silage. If you have to buy a lot of cottonseed meal, oilmeal or brewers' grains and raise only thirty and silage, quit the dairy business unless you can sell the herd's increase at paying figures.

The Guernsey cow is an active forerunner for whatever she can find; quiet, peaceable and well behaved, yet never a deadhead. In contests she has repeatedly won in respect to economical production of butter fat. The Guernsey is hearty and of strong constitution, capable of consuming a large amount of forage and what is of more importance, of giving good account of the milk for all she eats. The calves are strong and vigorous, somewhat larger than the Jerseys, though smaller than the Holsteins. They have good digestion and grow rapidly. The illustration shows a Guernsey bull.

A talk dealer said one day: "That Quaker has only eight cows, but he has soy bean pasture and sweet corn and his pastures are never eaten close. He feeds silage the year round and has a fine field of alfalfa for hay. Every one of the cows is a payer, and folks buy his calves because they know it. He buys only a little load of cottonseed meal every winter, and his milk checks are as large as any in his neighborhood, and some of his neighbors have twenty cows."

Do you get the idea? The cows are payers. He raises the feed. He has only eight cows and does not have to work sixteen hours per day to make wages. The theory is all right that, in a business run in a small way is profitable, operated on a large scale it should yield profits proportionately larger, but it does not work on the average farm. There is a fault to the farm's accommodation and the owner's ability.

HARD MILKING COWS.

This Condition May Be Overcome by Use of Teat Plugs.

A hard milking cow may be helped by the use of a teat plug or the bison plug, says Howard's Dairyman. Teat plugs tend to relax the sphincter muscles, which in such cases seems to close the opening of the teat so tightly that it is with difficulty that the milk is forced out. These plugs are made of lead or hard rubber and are placed in the teat duct and a tape tied around the teat through the eye hole in the plug. The plugs are worn from one milking to another. This is continued until the muscles are somewhat relaxed and the opening remains larger.

If this does not give relief it would be best to get a veterinarian to examine the teats and prescribe treatment. Liberal feeding is recommended. The history is an instrument which is easily slipped into the teat and the little cutting knife thrust out and quickly removed. It is all over before the animal realizes anything has happened. The history should not be used when the cow is dry, but when she is giving milk.

When to Feed Roughage.
It is a mistake to feed roughage to cows before milking. The dust from the dry fodder and the odors from silage get into milk when roughage is fed before or during milking.

LIVE STOCK AND DAIRY.

Each cow's udder should be thoroughly cleansed before milking, and the bands of the udder should be absolutely clean and dry.

The good dairy cow has a capacity for a tremendous amount of feed, and this feed must be furnished her if she is going to yield the best returns.

It is a well known fact that disease is more prevalent among hogs just after they are started on new corn than any other time.

Hog sheds need not be expensive, but they should be dry, tight enough to exclude rains and snow and also capable of being well ventilated in summer when the weather is hot and shade is needed.

Disinfect all troughs at least once a week. Don't let them become foul.

It never pays to feed lice. Keep your pigs clean and free from pests and they will grow faster.

Farm and Garden

RIPE FOR THE SILO.

When Corn and Other Crops Should Be Harvested.

[W. R. Dobson, Louisiana station.]
Corn is ready to harvest for silage the silo about the same time it is ready for harvesting the fodder. The grains should be well dried and glazed and a few of the lower leaves turned brown. If the corn is cut too green the silage will be sour and the feeding value decreased, while, on the other hand, if the corn is too ripe it will not pack well in the silo.

Sorghum should be harvested for the silo while the seed are in the dough stage. Like corn, if it is left in the field until it has become too dry the silage will contain a large amount of indigestible material and will not make a good quality of silage.

The time of harvesting the crop for filling the silo—that is, the stage in which the crops should be harvested—must be given great consideration if a good quality is to be obtained.

Few vines, soy beans and other hay crops should be harvested for the silo at the same time as for making hay—that is, when in full bloom and few of the heads are ripe.

Wheat After Fallow.

At the Rothamsted experiment station in England wheat has been grown continuously and also alternating with fallow for fifty-eight years. The records of the station have the following to say regarding the work:

"It will be seen that the produce of wheat after fallow is considerably higher than when it is grown continuously. 17.1 bushels against 12.7 bushels per acre, but if reckoned as produce over the whole area, half in crop and half in fallow, the whole area grows much less of both grain and straw than when the crop is grown year after year on the same land. A given area of land would therefore be more productive when cropped every year than if the crop were alternated with fallow. The superior yield of the portion in crop after a fallowing may in some degree be attributed to the greater freedom from weeds, but in the main it is due to the production of nutrients from the humus of the soil during the summer when it is fallow, a process which is much stimulated by the stirring it receives and the consequent aeration. The success of a fallowing depends upon these nutrients remaining for the succeeding crop. They may be entirely washed away by heavy autumnal rains."

Sod and Insects.

To guarantee against insects do not follow a grass sod with such a grain crop as corn. It is well to keep the land fallow for a time.

AVOID SILO ACCIDENTS.

With the opening of the silo filling season there will be frequent reports of serious and fatal accidents. The manufacturers of silage cutters have greatly improved their construction in recent years, and most accidents nowadays are the result of carelessness. Practically all of them can be avoided by the exercise of reasonable care. In addition to the exercise of common sense at the feeding end of the machine, here are some things that the inexperienced man should do:

Be sure that the machine is being run at the proper speed.

Take care that corn is never put into the machine until the motion is up to full speed.

In stopping be careful not to shut off the power until the elevator is empty. If the elevator is not empty the cut material will fall back and lodge in the fans. Then when the machine is started again the cut corn jams the fans, and as a result they are bent or broken.

THEATRICAL

"What's His Name?"
Harvey, the beau of Blakeville, a soda clerk, is very popular with the girls. Harvey marries Nellie, the baker's daughter, against the wishes of Harvey's uncle, a trusty old bachelor, who is the village photographer.

After three years of blissful married life Nellie meets one of the chorus girls of a visiting show and through her joins the chorus.

When the show leaves for New York Nellie, Harvey and Phoebe, their little girl, go with it. During the performance in New York Nellie makes a big hit and arouses the interest of Fairfax, a millionaire man-about-town. Nellie becomes the star of the play at a big salary.

At the manager's suggestion to keep her husband in the background she establishes Harvey and Phoebe in a house at Tarrytown and spends Sunday with them there.

Harvey becomes known as "What's His Name," the husband of Nellie Duluth. In a few years Nellie becomes the rage of New York and because of Fairfax she rarely comes to see Harvey and Phoebe.

Harvey meets Fairfax and becomes jealous of his attentions to Nellie and, while leaving the theatre after a short visit, he sees waiters bringing food and wine to her dressing room and returns later to find Nellie, Fairfax and a great party of friends hilariously supping. Harvey flourishes a revolver and breaks up the party.

After Harvey returns home Fairfax calls on him and offers him a large sum of money to allow Nellie to secure a divorce. Harvey, enraged, strikes Fairfax, whereupon the latter brutally beats him.

The next day Nellie calls and tells Harvey that they are going to marry. They attempt to take Phoebe from him but fail. Nellie has the furniture removed and turns them out of their home and leaves for Reno, while Harvey and Phoebe start back to Blakeville afoot. After several weary months they arrive there in tatters and are taken in by their uncle, who helps Harvey to a new start. At Blakeville he is welcomed by all his friends and takes his old job back.

Phoebe becomes dangerously ill and Harvey wries Nellie.

She has been disillusioned by Fairfax and comes back at once, a repentant and wiser woman.

Majestic Theatre, Friday, January 14.

This is the era of rapid progress and intense living. We are going full speed ahead at such a rapid pace that it is difficult to keep abreast of day to day developments unless through such a medium as Lyman H. Howe's Travel Festival, which comes to the Majestic Theatre on Wednesday, February 2nd.

By way of illustrating this point, the reader may remember that a short time ago governmental wheels were set in motion which ended in congress creating a new national park. It is not only our latest but one of our largest national playgrounds and in many respects is entirely unlike any other within our boundaries. Yet it is doubtful whether any reader in ten can recall its name, location or size, and certainly none could imagine its real grandeur. So in order to reveal this new wonderland adequately—Glacier National Park, comprising 1500 square miles—Howe's photographers penetrated to its inmost recesses through courtesies and facilities extended by the Great Northern Railway.

As is typical of Howe's exhibitions, a great variety of other scenes will be presented, such as an aeroplane flight above the clouds, a torpedo boat struggling through a terrific gale, curious examples of crystallization, adventures in the insect world, logging in Italy, a graphic portrayal of the movements of animals reproduced so slowly that they show details which the human eye could never detect, the Firth of Forth bridge in Scotland, Maderia, winter in the Swiss Alps, and one of the greatest industries in our era, showing every phase that enters into the construction of the latest type automobile as seen on a trip through the Willys-Overland plant at Toledo, Ohio. Besides there will be freely interspersed many of those ever-welcome cartoon comedy films which always form such a pleasing diversion in Howe's productions.

Will Call Every Day.

From now on my milk wagon will be on the street every day of the week and I will sell milk at the same price as charged by other dairymen. Phone 167721 and let me fill your milk orders. Adv. 50tf. Elmer Ingalls.

Grange Column

Wilson Grange

Wilson grange No. 719 met in regular session Saturday evening January 8, 1916, with an attendance of thirteen members.

On account of the absence of the Master, the Overseer took charge of the meeting.

The principal order of business was election of officers of which the following were elected.

Master—Thomas Shepard
Overseer—Luther Brintnall
Lecturer—Mable Holland
Steward—Samuel Nowland
Ass't Steward—Arthur Brintnall
Chaplain—Irene Frost
Treasurer—E. S. Brintnall

Gate Keeper—Basil Holland
Ceres—Glennie Vrondran
Pomona—Fae Warden
Flora—Esther Shepard
L. A. Steward—Ethel Brintnall
Organist—Fae Warden
Business Ag't—E. S. Brintnall
The members voted to have Mr. and Mrs. O. D. Smith, our delegates, State grange, install the officers at our next meeting January 22. After a short program grange closed in form.

Maple Grove Grange.

Maple Grove had their installation last Tuesday evening, January 4th. Brother and Sister Gardner of Pine Lake Grange installed the following officers:

Worthy Master—E. E. Stroud.
Overseer—Floyd Bartholomew.
Lecturer—Olive Webster.
Steward—Otto Kane.
A. S.—Wilbur Lewis.
Chaplain—Lillian Bartholomew.

Ceres—Ella Kane.
Pomona—Sarah Tyndall.
Flora—Fannie Lewis.
L. A. S.—Anna Stroud.

A rising vote of thanks was given Brother Gardner for his report from State Grange. Lecture hour consisted of singing, reading and a dialogue entitled "The Most Popular Man," which was the janitor. Another dance was voted for January 28. Grange closed in due form.

ADDITIONAL LOCALS

Joseph Reed, an aged resident of the city, is reported to be seriously ill.

Captain H. Berdan is reported to be confined to his home with the grippe.

Joseph Klooster of Muskegon is visiting friends and relatives in the city.

Mrs. George Taylor left last week for Iron Mountain, where she will spend the winter with her son.

L. E. Benton has been confined to his home the past week from an attack of the prevailing grippe.

Wright Ripley left Monday for an extended visit to Flint, Detroit and other southern Michigan points.

Mrs. G. C. Booth and son, Kenneth, returned Monday from Traverse City, where they have been visiting relatives.

There will be a dance at the Maple Grange hall Thursday evening, January 27. Music by D. L. Trafford. Everyone invited.

Ernest Kibbie returned last week from Chicago, where he has been a member of the South Chicago coastguard station during the past season.

Jack Fotch of Petoskey drove over a party of young friends by auto Sunday. It is reported they made the trip in fifty-five minutes.

School opened on Wednesday of last week after two weeks vacation. Many vacant seats testified to the numerous cases of grippe among the children.

Benjamin Brown will leave on Thursday of this week to attend the automobile show at Grand Rapids and Detroit. He expects to be gone about a week.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank G. Hines left Tuesday morning for Detroit, enroute to Port Orange, Florida, where they will spend the remainder of the winter.

The families of Lisle Shanahan and W. E. Hampton are now located at the Hotel Charlevoix, having closed their homes on the north side for the winter months.

After allowing the public to slip and slide on the extremely icy sidewalks for several days, the council finally ordered the street commissioner to sprinkle the walks with sand.

Revival services every night at 7:30 over Taylor's grocery store. Elder E. R. Owen of Muskegon Heights has charge of the services. All are given a cordial invitation to attend.

Mrs. Daniel McSaubia, wife of Mail Carrier Dan McSaubia, slipped and fell on the icy steps at their home on the north side, Monday, breaking her left arm between the wrist and elbow.

A letter received today from Congressman Frank D. Scott states that he has filed with the navy department the appointment of Clarence Hanshaw, son of Alonzo Hanshaw of this city, as midshipman in the navy.

Mr. and Mrs. Geo. W. Priest returned the first of the week from their extended visits—Mr. Priest from Detroit, where he has been for the past three weeks, and Mrs. Priest from New York and other eastern points, where she has been for the past two months.

Beginning with last Tuesday an additional rate of four per cent will be charged on all unpaid taxes. City Treasurer Cook has been a busy man the past two weeks, getting out receipts for persons paying their state, county, city and school taxes. So far the amount received and the number who have paid are equal to that of last year.

Only Once.

Two old ladies, both of whom were well cared for, were once conversing about their affairs. One was a jolly old lady, while the other was of a sad disposition.

"Well, well," said the jolly one, "it's pleasant to be old. We get the best of everything—the easiest chairs, the best plates, the tenderest morsels."

"Yes, yes," sighed the other, forced to admit that her life was an easy one, "that's all very true, but what's the use? We can't be old but once."—Youth's Companion.

Dust Recovery at Cement Mills.
Recovery of dust from the waste kiln gases of a cement manufacturing plant in California is accomplished by a system of gravity separation and washing, says the Engineering Record. The dust collecting system is the outcome of a lawsuit brought against the cement company by orange growers, who contended that their fruit was being spoiled by the dust from the plant. The total amount of dust recovered per day is seventy-five tons.

SYNOPSIS.

John Bellamy Smart, unmarried and heir to a fortune, while abroad with his secretary, Poppendyke, and his valet, Britton, buys a dilapidated old castle on the Danube, in care of the Schmicks, and discovers a mysterious woman inhabiting one of the towers.

Smart fails to batter down a huge door leading to the east wing in search of the fair lady. He interrupts a visit of American relic hunters.

Their numerous attempts to buy some of the castle's ancient furniture result in their discomfiture and hurried departure. Smart catches a glimpse of his fair neighbor's waving hair.

Another visit to the mysterious stranger wing fails, but later the beautiful stranger strikes up an acquaintance with the new owner through a secret loophole.

Smart aids the countess to foil her ex-husband's attempt to find his way through a secret door and tries to throw the count off the track.

Smart dines with the countess in celebration of the departure of the count and other guests and she speaks of buried treasure.

The newspapers publish statements in which Smart is made to say he ordered Count Tarnowski in everything. Smart sends a denial.

The count invites the "fool" to lend him $100,000 for which he offers doubtful security. He shows resentment when the money is refused.

CHAPTER XII.

I Am Invited Out to Dinner.

MY FIRST PLEASURE went away with the others at half past 11, and that was the end of his first visit to my domain.

For fear that you, kind reader, may be disappointed, I make haste to assure you that he was to come again.

Of course there was more or less turmoil and I might say disaffection attending his departure. He raised Cain with my servants because they did this and that when they shouldn't have done either; he and the amiable baron took me to task for having neglected to look compartments for them in the Orient express; he insisted upon having a luncheon put up in a tea basket and taken to the railway station by Britton, and he saw to it personally that three or four bottles of my best wine were neatly packed in with the rest. He said three or four, but Britton is firm in his belief that there was nearer a dozen, judging by the weight.

"Well, thank the Lord," said I, as the ferry put off with the party, leaving me alone on the little landing. The rotten planks seemed to echo the sentiment. At the top of the steep all the Schmicks were saying it, too; in the butler's pantry it was also being said; a score of workmen were grunting it, and the windlass that drew me up the hill was screaming it in wild, discordant gloom. I repeated it once more when Britton returned from town and assured me that they had not missed the train.

Conrad, grinning from ear to ear, was waiting for me outside my bed room door late in the day. He saluted me with unusual cordiality.

"A note, mein herr," said he, and handed me a dainty little pearl gray envelope.

"I shouldn't be home for dinner, Count," said I, my eyes aglow. "Tell Hawkes, will you?"

The countess welcomed me with a radiant smile. We shook hands.

"Well, he has gone," said I, drawing a deep breath.

"Thank the Lord," said she. And then I knew that the symphony was complete. We all sang it.

It must not be supposed for an instant that I had been guilty of neglecting my town charge during that season of travel and despair. No, indeed! I had visited her every day as a matter of precaution. She required a certain amount of watching.

I do not hesitate to say at this time that she seemed to be growing heavier every day. In a natural way she was changing, but only in appearance, but in manner.

Now, to be perfectly frank about it, I can't explain just what these little changes were; that is, not in so many words, but they were quite as pronounced as they were subtle. I may risk mentioning an improvement in her method of handling me. She was not taking quite so much in gratitude as she did at first. She was no more humble and considerate. I remarked, instead of muting her thin things she now exposed me; instead of making demands upon my patience and generosity she rather lashed me about putting me to the least trouble.

She wasn't so arrogant nor so hard to manage. To a nutshell, I may say with some satisfaction, she was beginning to show a surprising amount of respect for me and my opinions.

Her devotion to Rosemary was woe dear to me. By the way, while I think of it, the child was quite adorable. She was learning to pronounce my name and getting nearer and nearer to it every day. At the time of which I now write she was calling me (with great enthusiasm) by the name of "Go-go," which reduced to aboriginal American means "Man-With-the-Strong-Arm-Who-Carries-Baby."

"It is very nice of you to ask me up to dine with you," said I.

"Isn't it about time I was doing something for you in return for all that you have done for me?" she inquired gaily. "We are having a particularly nice dinner this evening, and I thought you'd enjoy a change."

"A change?" said I, with a laugh. "As if we haven't been eating out of the same kettle for days!"

"I was not referring to the food," she said, and I was very properly sneezed.

"Nevertheless, speaking of food," said I, "it may interest you to know that I expected to have rather a sumptuous repast of my own to celebrate the deliverance. A fine, plump pheasant, prepared a la Oscar, corn fritters like another used to make, potatoes plumed."

"And a wonderful alligator pear salad," she interrupted, her eyes dancing.

I stared. "How in the world did you guess?"

"She laughed in pure delight, and I began to understand. By the Lord Harry, the amazing creature was in viding me to eat my own dinner in her salad manger!" "Well, may I be hanged! You do beat the fiddlers!"

She was wearing a wonderful dinner gown of Irish lace, and she fully sparkled with diamonds. As I looked at her standing there by the big oak table I couldn't help thinking that the count was not only a scoundrel but all kinds of a fool.

"It was necessary for me to bribe all of your servants, Mr. Smart," she said. "You did not offer the rascals much, did you?" I said in a horrified tone.

"No, indeed!" She did not explain any further than that, but somehow I knew that money isn't everything in a secret after all. "I hope you don't mind my borrowing your hatter and footman for the evening," she went on. "Not that we really need two to serve two, but it seems so much more like a function, as the newspapers would call it."

It was my turn to say "No, indeed."

"And now you must come in and kiss Rosemary good night," she said, glancing up at my great Amsterdam clock in the corner.

We went into the nursery. It was just Rosemary's bedtime by nearly an hour, and the youngster was having great difficulty in keeping awake. She managed to put her arms around my neck when I took her up from the bed, all tucked away in her warm little nightgown, and she presented her own little throat for me to kiss, but particularly hot when the honey came from in her disposition of sweets.

I was full of exuberance. An irresistible impulse to do a jig seized upon me. To my own intense amazement, I began to dance to the music of the room like a clumsy kangaroo.

Rosemary shrieked delightedly into my ear, and I danced the harder for that. The countess, recovering from her surprise, cried out in laughter and began to clap time with her hands. Blake forgot himself and sat down rather heavily on the edge of the bed. I think the poor woman's knees gave way under her.

"Hurray!" I shouted to Rosemary, but looking directly at the countess. "We're celebrating!"

Whereupon the girl that was left in the countess rose to the occasion and she promised with graceful abandon before me in amazing contrast to my jumping jack efforts. Only Blake's reserve and somewhat dampening adonitron brought me to my senses.

"Please don't drop the child, Mr. Smart," she said. I had the great satisfaction of hearing Rosemary cry when I delivered her up to Blake and started to sink out of the room in the wake of my warm checked hostess.

"You would be a wonderful father, sir," said Blake, relenting a little.

I had the grace to say, "Oh, please," and then got out while the illusion was still alive. As I said before, I do not like a cruel fate.

It was the most wonderful dinner in the world, and I understand it was served on a kitchen table moved into the living room for the occasion. Porcelain candleholders adorned the two corners of the table and the very best plates in the castle were put to use. There were roses in the center of the board, a huge bowl of short stemmed Maroon No. 1 beauties.

"Hence I told you, Mr. Smart, that I am expecting my mother here to visit me next week after next?"

She tactfully put the question to me at a time when I was so full of content that nothing could have depressed me.

"You don't say so?" I exclaimed, quite cheerfully.

"That is to say, she is coming if you think you can manage it quite safely."

"I manage it? My dear countess, why speak of managing a thing that is so obviously to be desired?"

"You don't understand. Can you smuggle her into the castle without any one knowing a thing about it?"

You see, she is being watched, every minute of the time by detectives, spies, secret agents, lawyers and heaven knows who else. The instant she leaves Paris, bang! It will be like the start of a shot in a race. They will be after her like a streak. And if you are not very, very clever, it may play too with everything."

"Thou why run the risk?" I ventured. "My two brothers are coming with her," she said rousingly. "They are such big, strong fellows that—"

"My dear countess, it isn't strength we'll need," I declared.

"No, no, I quite understand. It is cunning, strategy, caution and all that."

It was a very clever plan, but I play too with everything."

"Yes, sir; I thought you had."

"Ahem! I dare say Britton will do quite as well. Tell him to—"

"Britton, sir, has gone over to the city for the newspapers. You forget that he goes every morning as soon as he has had his—"

"Yes, yes! Certainly," I said hastily. "The papers. Ha, ha! Quite right."

It was news to me, but it wouldn't do to let him know it. The countess read the papers. I did not.

It was nearly 12 when my secretary reported to me on this particular morning.

"Mr. Poppendyke," said I, "are you employed by me or by that woman upstairs?" I would never have spoken of her as "that woman," believe me if I had not been in a state of irritation.

He looked positively stunned. "Sir?" he gasped.

I did not repeat the question, but managed to demand rather heavily. "Are you?"

"The countess had got dreadfully behind with her work, sir, and I thought you wouldn't mind if I helped her out a bit," he explained nervously.

"What?" "What work?"

"Her diary, sir. She is keeping a diary."

"Indeed?"

"It is very interesting, Mr. Smart. Rather better than any novel I've read lately. We've brought it quite up to date. I wrote at least three pages about the dinner last night. It is a bit to believe what she puts into her diary. It must have been a delightful occasion, as the newspapers would say."

I was somewhat mollified. "What did she have to say about it, Fred?" I asked. It always pleased him to be called Fred.

"That would be betraying a confidence," said he. "I will say this much however—I think I wrote your name fifty times or more in connection with it."

"Rubbish!" said I.

"Not at all," said he, with agreeable spirit.

A sudden chill came over me. "She isn't signing on having it published is she?"

"I can't say as to that," was his ill-quieting reply. "It wasn't any of my business, so I didn't ask."

"Oh," said I, "I see?"

"I think it is safe to assume, however, that it is not meant for publication," said he. "It strikes me as being a bit too personal. There are parts of it that I don't believe she'd dare to put into print, although she'd dare to put it into my hands as much as a bluish."

"On my soul, Mr. Smart, I never was so embarrassed in my life. She—"

"Never mind," I interrupted hastily. "Don't tell tales out of school."

He was silent for a moment, finger in his big eyeglasses nervously. "I may please you to know that she thinks you are an exceedingly nice man."

"No, it doesn't," I turned blazingly. "I'm blamed if I like being called an exceedingly nice man."

"They were my words, sir, not hers," he explained desperately. "I was merely putting two and two together—forming an opinion from her manner, not from her words. She is very particular to mention everything you do for her and thanks me if I call her attention to anything she may have forgot. She certainly appreciates your kindness to the baby."

"That is extremely gratifying," said I, smiling.

He hesitated once more. "Of course you understand that the divorce issue is absolute. It's only the matter of the child that remains unsettled. The—"

I fairly barked a him. "What the mischief do you mean by that, sir? What has the divorce got to do with it?"

"A great deal, I should say," said he with the care, almost supercilious patience that his small mind so valiantly tried to use.

"Upon my soul!" was all that I could say.

Hawkes rapped on the door luckily at that instant.

"The men from the telephone company are here, sir, and the electricians. Where are they to begin, sir?"

"Tell them to wait," said I. Then I hurried to the top of the east wing to ask if she had the best objection to an extension phone being placed in my study. She thought it would be very nice, so I returned with instructions for the men to put in three instruments—one in her room, one in mine and one in the butler's pantry. It seemed a very judicious arrangement all round. As for the electric bell system, it would speak for itself.

Toward the middle of the afternoon when Mr. Poppendyke and I were hard at work on my symptoms we were startled by a most mysterious pounding on the wall hard by. We paused to listen. It was quite impossible to locate the sound which ceased almost immediately. Our first thought was that the telephone men were drilling a hole through the wall into my study. Then came the sharp rat-a-tat once more. Even as we looked about us in bewilderment the party friends at Ludwig the Red moved out of alignment with a hoarse peeling squeak and a long thin streak of black appeared at the lower edge of the frame, crowding water and blacker if anything, before our startled eyes.

"Are you at home?" inquired a voice that could be by any means have originated from the chest of Ludwig, even in his mellowest moods.

I leaped to my feet and started across—

GRAIN DUST EXPLOSIONS.

Held Responsible for Wrecking Thrashing Machines and Cereal Mills.

(Prepared by United States department of agriculture.)

Nearly 300 thrashing machines were destroyed by explosions last year in eastern Washington, eastern Oregon and northern Idaho, the total loss being estimated at $1,000,000. This led to an investigation by the Washington state agricultural experiment station, and the United States department of agriculture has now taken up the matter in connection with its study of grain dust explosions in cereal mills, elevators and industrial plants. So great was the risk last year that insurance companies in the northwest refused to insure thrashing machines. In some quarters there was a disposition to attribute these occurrences to dissatisfied farm hands or tramps, but specialists now believe they were accidental explosions and that under certain conditions such mixture can be ignited and an explosion quickly follows. It is also known that last year there was a high percentage of stunt grain in the wheat crop in the far northwest, and preliminary experiments have also indicated that the dust itself is highly inflammable and has great explosive force.

From the accounts of explosions already received it appears that the occurrences originated at or near the cylinder of the thrashing machine, where the dust was very thick, and flashed through the entire machine instantly. In many cases the fire spread to the grain stacked near by. In industrial plants where similar explosions have occurred two reports have commonly been heard. The first is a sharp, quick sound, followed by a report of a rumbling nature, which lasts a longer time. The second report is usually followed by fire. It is supposed that the first report is due to a small quantity of very fine dust suspended in the air, having been ignited by some source of heat and exploded. This first explosion produces sufficient concussion to dislodge the dust settled near by, and this, when shaken into the air and mixed, is ignited by the heat of the first explosion.

There are a number of ways in which dust may be ignited, but in the case of thrashing machines it appears probable that electricity generated by the operation of the machine is chiefly responsible. The generation of a sufficient supply of electricity would result in the discharge of a spark, which under the proper conditions would serve to ignite the explosive mixture of dust and air.

Treatment of Clay Soils.

To keep the fertility of clay soils it is necessary to add considerable vegetable matter. This is best done by using all available manure and in addition by turning under an occasional second crop of clover or other legume. Even in the natural state clay soils rarely contain much humus. The supply of phosphorus is also limited and should be increased by the addition of phosphate fertilizer to supplement the farm manure.

NEW GAS BURNER.

Combination of Water Heater and Ordinary Cooking Flame.

A late patent covers a combined gas burner and water heater so arranged that the burner may be used in the customary manner, while at the same time water in a tank or reservoir will be heated without additional cost.

The heater consists of corrugated rings with upper and lower sections, distinct, although cast in one piece. Through the upper compartment water flows continuously from the supply to the tank. The lower compartment is connected with the gas supply, and the gas is brought to the lower edges of the corrugations by small pipes leading through the water compartment, burning at the orifice, as in the common type of gas stove. The flame extends above the corrugations, the top of the flame heating whatever vessel may be placed on the burner, while the heat from the side of the flames is conducted into the corrugations, heating the water inclosed therein without additional cost.

The department has assigned investigators to the Pacific northwest territory to study the explosion problem during the thrashing season. Experimental work has proved that when fine particles of cereal dusts are mixed with proper proportions of air the thrasher machine explosions are likely to occur wherever quantities of dust from grain or straw are produced.

Since it is probable, therefore, that there will be additional accidents of the same character this season in the various grain belts of the country the department of agriculture earnestly requests that full reports of all thrasher machine fires and explosions be promptly sent to the United States department of agriculture, Washington. For a number of years many mysterious fires and explosions have been experienced in thrashing machines in various sections of the country and have been in the absence of a definite cause ascribed to incendiarism. It is planned to study occurrences of this nature with the view of finding possible means of prevention.

THIS YEAR DO NOT FAIL

To take up the question of your reading matter with us. If the above list does not appeal to you come in and we will quote you money-saving prices on any magazine or paper published. These are the greatest newspaper bargains ever offered by any newspaper in Northern Michigan. It has always been our aim to save Courier readers all we could on their reading matter. This fall we are doing even better than before. We also give cut rates on all magazines, daily papers and trade magazines. The saving usually runs about 15 per cent, but in some instances it will amount to more. Keep in mind at all times that we can and will save you money on your newspaper and magazine subscriptions. These rates are absolutely cash propositions as they must be paid in advance.

A FOOL AND HIS MONEY

the room with great strides. My secretary's eyes were glued to the magic portrait.

"By the Lord Harry!" I cried. "Yes!" The secret door swung quietly open, laying Ludwig's face to the wall, and in the aperture stood my amazing neighbor, as lovely a portrait as you'd see in a year's trip through all the galleries in the world. She was smiling down upon us from the slightly elevated position, a charming figure in the very latest Parisian hat and gown.

"I am out minding afternoon calls," said she. Her face was flushed with excitement and self-consciousness. "Will you please put a chair here so that I may lay down?"

For answer I reached up a pair of eucalyptus arms. She laughed, turned for word and placed her hands on my shoulders. My hands found her waist, and I lifted her gently, gracefully to the floor.

"How strong you are!" she said admiringly. "How do you do, Mr. Poopendyke! Dear me! I'm not a ghost, sir!"

"How do you do?" he jerked out. Then he felt of his heart. "My God, I don't believe it's a ghost!"

Together we inspected the secret doors, going so far as to enter the room beyond, the countless peering through after us from my study. To my amazement the room was absolutely bare. Bed, trunks, garments, chairs, every thing, in fact, had vanished as if whisk ed away by an all powerful genie.

"What does this mean?" I cried, turning to her.

"I don't mind sleeping upstairs now that I have a telephone," she said serenely. "Max and Ludwig moved everything up this afternoon." Poopendyke and I returned to the study. I for one was bitterly disappointed.

"I'm sorry that I had the phone put in," I said.

"Please don't call it a phone!" she objected. "I hate the word phone."

"So do I," said Poopendyke reck lessly.

I glared at him. What right had he to criticize my manner of speech? He started to leave the room after a perfunctory scrutiny to put his papers to order, but she broke off in the middle of a sentence to urge him to remain.

She murmured that she was cutting on both of us.

"Please don't stop your work on my account," she said and promptly sat down at his typewriter and began pecking at the keys. "You must teach me how to run a typewriter, Mr. Poopendyke. I shall be as poor as a church mouse before long, and I know neither how to help me nor I may have to become a stenographer."

He laughed abundantly. "I don't believe I've ever seen a more unattractive fellow than Poopendyke."

"Oh, every count has its silver side," said he awkwardly.

"But I am used to gold," said she. The two on the machine looked at each other.

"She Was Smiling Down Upon Us."

"What do I do now?" He made the shift and the change to her.

"Go right ahead," said he. She scrutinized the whole alphabet across his broad chest, but he didn't seem to mind.

"Isn't it odd, Mr. Smart? If Mr. Poopendyke should ever leave you I am sure you would be able to take his place as your secretary."

I bowed very low. "You may be quite sure, madame, that I shall dismiss Mr. Poopendyke the instant you apply for his job."

"And I shall most cheerfully oblige you," said he. "Stily, yes."

I couldn't help thinking how infinitely more attractive and personable she would be as a typist than the excellent young woman who had married the jeweler's clerk and what an improvement on Poopendyke!

"I came down to inquire when you would like to go exploring for buried treasure, Mr. Smart," she said after the cylinder had slipped back with a bang that almost startled her out of her pretty boots and caused her to give up typewriting then and there forevermore.

"Never put off till tomorrow what you can do today," quoted I glibly.

She looked herself over. "If you knew how many times this gown had to be put off till tomorrow, you wouldn't ask me to ruin it the second time I've had it on my back."

"It is an uncommonly attractive gown," said I.

"Shall we set tomorrow for the treasure quest?"

"Tomorrow is Sunday."

"Can you think of a better way to kill it?"

"Yes, you might have me down here for an old fashioned midday dinner."

"Capital! Why not stay for supper, too?"

"It would be too much like spending a day with relatives," she said. "We'll go treasure hunting on Monday. I haven't the faintest notion where to look, but that shouldn't make any difference. No one else ever had. By the way, Mr. Smart, I have a bone to pick with you. Have you seen yesterday's papers? Well, in one of them there is a long account of my—of Mr. Pless' visit to your castle, and a lengthy interview in which you are quoted as saying that he is one of your dearest friends, and a much maligned man who deserves the sympathy of every law abiding citizen in the land."

"An admirable lie!" I cried indignant.

"Another paper says that your fortune has been placed at his disposal in the light he is making against the criminally rich Americans. In this particular article you are quoted as saying that I am a dreadful person and not fit to have the custody of a child."

"Good Lord!" I gasped helplessly.

"You also expect to do everything in your power to interest the administration at Washington in his behalf."

"Well, of all the Oh, I say, countess, you don't believe a word of all this do you?"

She regarded me pensively. "You have said some very mean, unwell things to me."

"I thought you believed"—I began desperately, but her sudden smile relieved me of the necessity of jumping into the river. "My love, I shall write to those miserable sheets, degrading every word they've printed. And what's more, I'll bring an action for damages against all of 'em. Why, it is positively atrocious!" The whole world will think I despise you and—I stopped very abruptly in great confusion.

"And you don't?" she queried, with real seriousness in her voice. "You don't despise me?"

"Certainly not!" I cried vehemently. Turning to Poopendyke, I said: "Mr. Poopendyke, will you at once prepare a complete and emphatic denial of every word they have printed about me, and I'll send it to all the American correspondents in Europe. We'll cable it ourselves to the United States. I shan't rest until I am set straight in the eyes of my fellow countrymen. The whole world shall know, countess, that I am for you first, last and all the time. It shall know!"

"But you don't know who I am, Mr. Smart," she broke in, her cheeks very warm and rosy. "How can you publicly espouse the cause of one whose name you refuse to have mentioned in your presence?"

I dismissed her question with a wave of the hand. "Poopendyke can supply the name after I have signed the statement. I give him carte blanche. The name has nothing to do with the case so far as I am concerned. Write it, Fred, and make it strong."

She came up to me and held out her hand. "I knew you would do it," she said softly. "Thanks."

She not only came for dinner with us on Sunday, but made the dressing for my alligator pear salad. We were besieged by the usual crowd of Sunday nighters, who came clamoring at our staunch, re-enforced gates and anathematized me soundly for refusing admittance. One bourgeois party of fifteen refused to leave the piazza until their return fares on the ferry barge were paid, stoutly maintaining that they had come over in good faith and wouldn't leave until I had returned them to the extent of 50 hellers apiece, very late. I sent Britton out with the money. He returned with the rather disappointing news that he had recognized two of Mr. Pless' secret agents in the mob.

"I wonder if he suspects that I am here," said the countess, pulling perceptibly when I mentioned the presence of the two men.

I did not sleep well that night. The presence of the two detectives outside my gates was not to be taken too lightly.

FOUR AUTOS BURN IN FIRE

Old Crouter Warehouse and Contents
Are a Total Loss.

Fire Spread to Storehouse in Rear of C. S. Danto & Son's Store—Little Insurance Carried.

Fire originating from an unknown source totally destroyed the ware house on the Crouter property on the lake front in the rear of F. S. Bettles Electric Store, and partially burned a storage building at the rear of C. S. Danto & Son's store last Thursday evening about eleven o'clock.

The interior of the building was a mass of flames when the fire was discovered by Mr. Bettles, who heard the crackling of the flames some minutes before he realized the building was afire. From the ware house the flames spread to the adjoining building owned by Danto, which was also soon fiercely burning. The roof of the ware house fell in before the fire department arrived. The lower part of the Danto building was saved, although badly scorched.

In the Crouter warehouse was stored four automobiles three Fords, owned by F. S. Bettles, Richard Lewis and Orson Everetts, and a Buick car owned by O. A. Solomon. The four cars were totally destroyed and now are a twisted mass of rods and running gear. The car owned by Richard Lewis was insured for $400.00 while the others carried no insurance and are a total loss to the owners. The value of the cars were placed by the owners, as follows: F. S. Bettles, $350.00; Orson Everetts, $350.00; Richard Lewis, $450.00, and O. A. Solomon about $300.00. The loss to the Crouter ware house will run about $400.00, and on Danto building about $300.00, which was partially insured.

CHILDREN ARE GIVEN A TREAT

Fine Collection of Drawing and Manual Art Work.

On Exhibition in School During Past Week
—Parents Invited to See Them.

The children of the Charlevoix public schools have been given a rare treat during the past week. Supt. H. A. Craig has secured the Grand Rapids Art exhibit. It is a fine collection of drawing and manual art work. The children have enjoyed examining the work, and have carried away with them higher standards of work, which will be seen in the future work of the children.

The parents and the patrons of the school are invited to examine this exhibition of work from a neighboring town, in order that a good standard may be set for judging the work of our own school. For this purpose Friday afternoon from 1:15 until 1:30 o'clock has been set aside. It is hoped that a large number will avail themselves of this opportunity to see a fine art exhibit as done by the grade children of Grand Rapids.

Ladies of St. Mary's church will give a baked goods sale and 50 cent tea at Yettaw's confectionery store Wednesday, January 26. Adv. 311—jd

G. R. & I. Railroad Agrees to Furnish Farmers Seed Without Cost.

The G. R. & I. Railway Company have started a sugar beet campaign. They are out with a proposition to furnish free of cost sufficient quantity of sugar beet seed to plant a quarter of an acre to all farmers who make request for the seed. The only conditions are that the seed shall be planted and the crop cultivated according to instructions, with the single inconvenience on the part of the grower of pulling up, wrapping and forwarding (bags and labels furnished) samples of the beets when matured for analytical purposes, the crop, of course, to be the property of the farmers, excepting the above beets—from three to six sent in as samples.

The move is a good one for all concerned, as it will demonstrate by actual test the adaptability of the different sections along the railroad to sugar beet cultivation, and this industry is fully as desirable in the way of freights to the railroad as it is a desirable cash crop to the farmer.

A Correction.

Owing to an error made at this office during the rush trying to get the monthly statements out to the papers, the cash balance was left out and as was shown by figuring up the receipts and disbursements as given in the statement, a cash balance of $2808.52 was left on hand January 1, 1916.

Yours truly,
George W. Weaver, County Treasurer.

DEATH CLAIMS MRS. DRIGGETT

Had Been Confined to Her Home by Illness Some Weeks.

Funeral Services Held from M. E. Church Sunday at 2 P. M., Rev. Q. Walker Officiating.

Shortly after 7 o'clock last Thursday morning death came to Mrs. W. T. Driggett at her home on West Antrim street. Death was caused by a complication of diseases. While the news was not unexpected, the entire community felt a distinct shock at the realization that a strong and useful life was ended.

Deceased was born at Cadillac, February 1, 1877, and was 39 years of age at the time of her death. She was married to W. T. Driggett in Boyne City, November 22, 1893, and started house-keeping on a farm in Hayes township. In 1899 they moved to Charlevoix, where they have since resided.

The immediate family who survive are her husband; two daughters, Cora and Annis, and two sons, William, Jr., and George. Besides these are her aged father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. D. Horton of Bay Shore, and several sisters and brothers.

The funeral was held Sunday afternoon at 2:00 o'clock from the Methodist Episcopal church. Rev. Quinton Walker officiating. Burial took place at Brookside cemetery. The funeral of Mrs. Driggett was one of the largest held from this church in years. Her worth in life and the loss felt through her death as a resident of this city and a member of the church was attested by the vast presence of the relatives and friends who gathered to pay their last respects.

ELECT OFFICERS

Archibald Butters Chosen as President of Charlevoix County Bank.

At a meeting of the owners of the Charlevoix County Bank held January 17th, 1916, Honorable Archibald Butters was elected president, Albert F. Bridge, was elected vice-president and cashier, and Harry O. Mohrinn was continued in the position of assistant cashier. The action of the members of the firm taken in November continuing the partnership for five years was ratified, giving the bank the combined support of Mr. Butters, Mr. Bridge and the estate of John Nicholls, bringing a total of two hundred thousand dollars of unincumbered property as part of the bank's available resources, thus continuing it as one of the strongest banks in Northern Michigan.

SPEECH OF SCHOOL COMMISSIONER TO THE DIRECTORS AND OFFICERS

Parents Urged to See That Attendance Record is Raised—Also Schools in County Adopt Uniform System of Text Books—Many Other Valuable Suggestions Made by Commissioner.

County School Commissioner May L. Stewart handed out a bunch of good suggestions to the directors and school officers of the county in her speech at the recent meeting held in this city. She urged a better attendance, the adoption of uniform text books, and suggests that Charlevoix county schools make a record of obtaining fifteen Standard Schools during the year of 1916. Following is her report:

A common problem faces all school officers. Teachers are confronted with the same problem of schoolroom improvement. We must work together to get results. If we work together but part of the time we shall only get partial results. We must work together from the beginning unto the end.

The annual report is a source of some annoyance, but is a necessity to the state department. Let us group the mistakes of this year under three headings. First, you get your statistics at the top of your report from your teacher's register. These registers are of every kind and description. Many of them do not even follow the directions of the state department in finding totals. If every director in Charlevoix county will buy A. Hamlin Smith's Combination Register from Henry Pattengill, Lansing, Michigan, for the mere sum of 75 cents we can start the new year with a clean page. I can then assure you that every county normal graduate will have learned how to make out this report and will realize its importance. Every experienced teacher will have had experience also in handling a register just like yours and it will be easier for her to make a correct report. I am sure your teacher will be glad to copy her term reports into a new register, and you will find that it is worth while. Perhaps you already have this register. If not, that is what you want without delay and with uniform registers throughout the county we can save time, labor, postage and temper.

Second, no matter what system of books you as director may be keeping, you should keep all your receipts and all your expenditures on two pages facing each other, just as the department has recommended in the "Digest of School Laws." With everything altogether you can compute your totals at a glance, you will save a great deal of inconvenience at the close of the school year, and no doubting elector can question your method. The mistakes in the census roll are due to various causes, but if we study the instructions carefully we can easily overcome this fault.

The one thing that I have been trying to hit the hardest this fall is the attendance record. There are many schools in which the percentage is not above 60 per cent, and nearly all of the absence inexcusable. You pay your teacher full wages every month to teach the children who are enrolled. Her time is wasted by thoughtless parents who keep their children at home regardless of compulsory education laws. We intend to enforce these laws, but we need your cooperation to raise the standard in your district.

The boys and girls are anxious to come in order to win the certificates of award and diplomas of honor granted by every teacher. Would the parents of your district not work also for a district prize? Would you strive for first place with your neighboring district? During the June session of the board of supervisors I hope to obtain permission to offer an award in money for the highest percentage of attendance during the next school year. This money would be sent directly to the school board of the winning district with the one proviso that the money be spent entirely on schoolroom improvement leading to a standard plate.

The state department endorses potato vacations. We are glad to grant this time to help the farmer and to show our approval of hard manual labor. It is good for boys and girls, good for all of us, but when the vacation is over every child should be in school, not part of the time but all of the time, and not on the second or third day but on the very first day after the vacation. We, you and I, have a right to expect this much from the parents of this county as a square American deal. In October, just at the close of the potato vacation, it was necessary for Mr. Dean to serve thirty notices in one week. Not a square deal, is it? You have the chance to tell your taxpayers when they ask "for such a vacation again and you have the privilege of insisting on perfect attendance when school is in session.

Next year; thanks to our lawmakers, every teacher must have either experience or normal training or both. Your teacher cannot get her certificate renewed unless she attends a state normal at least one summer in three.

There are five reading circle classes in the county to give every teacher a chance to read the reading circle books. If your teacher is truly progressive she will belong to one of these, and you have a right to expect her to do this.

A number of years ago our county had a uniform system of textbooks—Baldwin's Readers, Milne's Arithmetics, Redway and Hinman's Geographies, Overton's Physiology and Harrington's Spellers. But methods have changed a great deal since those times; our teachers are trained in new methods and those books follow the old. Teachers realize this difficulty and are asking for new texts. A few have succeeded. Where the books are old you need new books anyway. So when you change the books in your district if you will adopt the recommended list in the back of the directory you will find that teacher and pupils will both progress more rapidly. Very soon your neighboring school will have the same texts and with new uniform books in the county every teacher you hire will already be familiar with the texts you use. Thus you will save time and work in the schoolroom. The books you want are the recommended books in the back of this year's directory.

Let me take this opportunity to announce in person that I shall be in Boyne City in the central school building 10-12 a. m. the second Saturday of each month; in Charlevoix school building on the third Saturday 10-12 a. m. and in East Jordan at home on either the first or fourth Saturday. I have these office hours in order to learn how the schools in each vicinity are progressing, and it would please me to have you or any of your patrons call to acquaint me with these conditions.

We want 15 Standard Schools in 1916. But what is a Standard School? A Standard School is one that the state department is not ashamed of. It is a school that is properly equipped, has its pupils correctly and comfortably seated, has enough windows comfortably placed and a good ventilating system. It is a school which the department openly endorses by placing on the front of the building a plate bearing the words "Standard School."

As we look over the boys and girls of our county schools can we realize what figures show? That at the present rate one out of every five will die of consumption? That of those who die three out of every four are infected in the schoolroom before the age of sixteen? Can we realize that in the dust of the poorly swept, poorly ventilated room 87 per cent. of our boys and girls are already infected with the dread white plague? In the face of these figures is it too much to ask that every school be thoroughly cleaned every month just as you would clean your kitchens? In the presence of a representative, from the state department I am proud to say that two-thirds of our schools already have good ventilating systems. Surely in the face of these figures the other one-third will not postpone their action.

In Cheboygan county a few years ago a test was made of the vision of country school children. The test showed that 51 per cent. of the pupils had defective vision in one form or another. Causes are much in the same in Charlevoix county: One half enough light or cross light for continuous straining of the eyes through six consecutive hours.

When schoolhouses were first built these matters had not been investigated. We cannot help the fact that our schoolhouses have been wrongly built. Years have come and gone without our knowledge of the steady advance of the slow creeping disease in our midst. Years have passed without our realizing the dreadful consequences of injured eyesight, but the results are known now. In the face of these facts a new era has dawned. Fathers and mothers throughout the land are demanding that their schoolhouses be remodeled to meet the requirements of health. The department has made a careful study of conditions and has published the manual of remodeling old buildings. Besides this they will be glad to answer any questions that you wish to ask them at any time about your building. At your invitation a state inspector will come without any expense to you to tell you just what your building lacks.

If every school board in Charlevoix county should this year vote a tax of $100 just for improvement and expend it wisely we could have twenty-five new Standard Schools in 1916 instead of our goal, fifteen new Standard Schools. All the remaining schools could complete their plans in one more year. Grand Traverse County already has as its slogan "Every School a Standard School." Shall we fall behind the mark? Get the improvement germ and the money will follow in its lead.

When your school has received Standard plates you may be a school about which your teacher may say "Here our boys and girls may become healthier and stronger, here their eyes are relieved from the strain of continuous study, and their lungs may daily and hourly expand with fresh pure air. As you gaze with pride at the plate above your door you may hear the teacher of your boyhood days reading to you: "It was not the thing that you did, my dear, but the thing that you left undone that gave you the bit of a heartache at the setting of the sun."

Arrested on Serious Charge

Elias Lampson was arrested by Deputy Sheriff Cook last Sunday on complaint of several parties, charging him with taking liberties with little girls. Prosecuting Atty Lewis and Sheriff Novak came over from Charlevoix Monday, and a hearing of the case was held before Justice Blount. Lampson was bound over to the February term of circuit court and taken by Sheriff Novak to Charlevoix to await trial. Lampson, who is about 45 years of age, is said to have spent considerable time coasting with children on the streets, and was with a couple of little tots when taken in custody by Sheriff Cook. —East Jordan Herald.

STATE SPEAKER TO BE PRESENT

"New Grange Movement for 1916," T. S. Barber, E. H. Clark and Ira Olney.
"What Can We Do to Promote Support of Grange Growth for 1916?" State Speaker W. M. Coons, Roscommon.

4:00 p. m.:—

Closing song, No. 23.

BAYLISS HERE

Soo Man Now Connected with State Game and and Fish Department.

Joseph Bayliss of the Soo, representative of the public domain commission of the State of Michigan, is in Charlevoix in the interests of the department and is gathering data on the extent of the commercial fishing industry in this section.

Mr. Bayliss has been delegated by the state department to secure data and compile statistics on commercial fishing in Michigan, and has covered the shore line of the upper peninsula, the Lake Huron shore, and is now working down the Lake Michigan shore. He secures data on the amount and kinds of fish taken, the equipment of the fishermen, its value, the amount of spawn taken, what is done with it, where it is desired of planting fish, where the best results are secured, etc.

Formerly this data was gathered by the deputy game wardens in their respective territory, but with the transfer of the duties of the game wardens to the public domain commission, the commission assumed the responsibility of securing the data.

PROBATE JUDGE MAKES REPORT

Twenty-two Estates Have Been Closed
During the Year.

Summary of the Proceedings in the Probate Court of County for Year 1915.

Judge of Probate S. A. Correll submits the following report, which shows in detail the amount of business transacted in his court during the past year:

During the year 1915 ninety-three causes of which this court has jurisdiction have been placed on the calendar, exclusive of juvenile court cases. Administration has been commenced in twenty-two intestate estates.

Thirteen wills have been filed and admitted to probate.

Twelve persons have been committed to the Traverse City State Hospital for insanity. Ten of the persons committed were residents of Charlevoix county; two were non-residents.

Four persons committed to Traverse City State Hospital for treatment under Act No. 94, Public Acts of 1913, commonly known as the Drug Act.

Three children placed on the waiting list for admission to the Michigan Home for the Feeble Minded at Lapeer.

Six children sent to the State Hospital at Ann Arbor for treatment under Act No. 274 of Public Acts of 1913, an act for the relief of crippled and deformed children.

Four children adopted into homes in Charlevoix county.

Inheritance tax determined and paid in five estates. The largest tax paid in any one estate was $111.09. The aggregate tax in the five estates was $376.28. Twenty-two estates have been closed during the year.

In the juvenile division of said court seventeen children have been brought before the court.

Six boys committed to the Industrial School at Lansing and one girl sent to the Industrial School at Adrian.

Three girls sent to the Public School at Coldwater.

EXPENSES OF STATE

Show an Increase of Over Three Hundred Per Cent. Since 1900.

The increase in the cost of state government by years from 1900 to 1915 is shown by the following table:

1900	$ 3,992,845 88
1901	3,986,190 67
1902	4,244,697 96
1903	4,618,395 22
1904	5,126,256 32
1905	5,124,685 05
1906	5,184,525 22
1907	5,118,675 67
1908	6,390,689 81
1909	6,290,605 35
1910	6,320,706 70
1911	6,320,420 79
1912	6,701,808 55
1913	7,463,179 04
1914	10,323,457 81
1915	10,528,382 58

As the state is passing through another period of being broke, these figures are particularly interesting at this time. That no one is to blame in particular for this increase in the expense of state government seems to be conceded. Nevertheless it is pointed out that the legislature has been voting the money of the people rather freely for many years past and the budget plan is now being urged upon the state. It has been proposed to submit an amendment to the state constitution to secure this reform, to be voted on at the general election in November.

DIED IN ALBERTA

Grippe Takes Marion Hudkins, One of Wilson Township's Early Settlers

Word was received last week by Charles Hudkins, of East Jordan, of the death of his father, Marion Hudkins, at his home in Alix, Alberta, on January 7, after a short attack of the grippe.

Mr. Hudkins was one of the earlier settlers in Wilson township, taking a homestead in 1871 and hewed out a finely improved farm on the Boyne Falls state road, where he lived with his family until some ten years ago, when he sold out and removed to Alberta. During his residence in Wilson Mr. Hudkins made many friends and was easily the foremost farmer in his township. He was 77 years of age and leaves beside his wife, four children—three sons and one daughter.

Are political jobs in the counties of Michigan more important to the taxpayers of the state than economy of administration? That is the first question to be answered in meeting the demand for reform of the system of county poor relief.

Why should every county support three commissioners of the poor? We might as well ask why a dog should have three tails. If the three tails filled a useful purpose, or if the three commissioners were needed to succor unfortunate humans, the questions would not be foolish.

As for the poor commissioners, it is evident that the present system is inherited from a distant past when constructive methods of human uplift were rare. Being so inherited it persists with the endurance of other political hoirooms likewise inherited and similarly entrenched behind "the good of party."

Taxpayers who know how to take two from four and leave two may be interested to note that Michigan's eighty-four counties maintain 232 commissioners of the poor, just three times the number actually needed. Kent county pays its trio a total of $3,600 a year in salaries alone. One active official would be sufficient. Indiana proves the argument for changing the system.
While Michigan is spending nearly $2-000,000 a year for "poor relief"—much of which does not go to the poor—Indiana, before revising her laws on the subject, spent only a third as much and Indiana is "some political state".
After the revision the expense was reduced by half.

Obedient to the behests of constituents the last legislature generously passed a bill requiring the governor to name a commission of five to investigate the problem in the whole state. Then "in the interests of economy"—while the lawmakers snickered in their sleeves—the measure was strangled by cutting out all appropriation for expenses of the investigation. Meantime the taxpayers are finding out by degrees the number of constant and steady leaks in the Michigan financial reservoir and by the next session of the legislature there is likely to be such a demand for reform that there will be definite results.
—Grand Rapids Press.

In reference to the above, Charlevoix faces the same problem as other counties of the state in regards to the cost of keeping her poor. During the year 1915 the total cost of keeping the poor in our county amounted to $14,250.36, which does not include officers' salaries amounting to $545.10, amounting in all to $14,795.46. The report made at the October session of the board of supervisors show that in the township of Hayes it cost the enormous sum of $2,797.88, or in other words, $129.62 in excess of a county tax of $1,524.72 and the county road tax of $1,143.54, to care for their poor. In St. James township it cost $778.54, or just $84.08 less than a total of $492.48 county tax and $386.74 county road tax. We have been informed that at the present time there are 51 people in Hayes township being taken care of by the poor commissioners and that at the present rate the figures for 1916 will greatly exceed those of 1915 in the cost of caring for poor in this township. Further information can be obtained in this matter by taking the total amount of taxes raised in the county and figuring the per cent paid out for taking care of the poor in the entire county. The problem is one of the most serious confronting taxpayers today, and the suggestions made in the above article appeal to us as worthy of consideration. Steps toward relief in some form should and will undoubtedly be taken.

Some people wonder at times why it is that conditions in the community are not what they should be, and after thinking the situation over in their own minds conclude that it is because the people are growing more lawless, and consequently the world is growing worse. This is not so. It never has been the case and it never will be. The real reason is because the people who believe in law and order are indifferent and shirk their duty as citizens. The laws of the land are all in favor of the law-abiding element, and when things go wrong it is this class instead of the lawless who are really to blame. There are valid laws enough upon the statute books to-day to make the United States a veritable paradise if they were properly and legally enforced. Law enforcement is more important than law making, but too few people seem to be wise to this all-important fact. The majority of well-intentioned people are a timid lot and always hesitate to assert their rights in the community because they may hurt the business of someone.

They seem to forget the fact that no legitimate business is ever interfered with through the enforcement of constitutional laws. It is only those engaged in illegitimate lines who suffer through obeying the law, and when they engage in such enterprises they take the chance and expect to lose in the long run. The percentage of those who intend to break laws in every community is small, but their numbers are rapidly increased when the people allow shady lines of business to get a foothold in the community.
Law is a necessity, and, being such, it should be strictly enforced for the adequate protection of the people. Any failure along this line is due to the so-called better element neglecting to do their duty as citizens and sitting placidly waiting for something to happen to change the order of things.—Record-Eagle.

HENRY Ford may be "the present great American joke," but his candidacy is solid wisdom compared with the proposal to run the discarded Chase S.
Osborn for Republican presidential preference in Michigan. The verdict of 1914 was the sentiment of Michigan
Republicans on Osborn.—East Jordan Enterprise. What a shock the above-expressed sentiment must be to some of Charlevoix's hero worshippers. Osborn sentiment in Michigan is leader than a door nail, with the exception of a few who were in on the "pap" distribution.

INDEPENDENTS WON FIRST GAME

Locals Take Game from Ellsworth by a Score of 48 to 14.

Visitors lacked Team Work and Practice—Other News in Basketball World.

In a wildcat fashion Charlevoix Independents in the first encounter of the winter season gathered a sack of scalps from the Ellsworth quintet to the tune of 48 14 at the rink last Friday night.
Ellsworth put up a gamey exhibition, but before real class fell hard.

The first half was of practically no excitement other than the local men tallied 30 points, and the visitors not a single count. Vogt and Jacobs retired from the game at this interval and substitutions were made from the list of applicants for this year's quintet.

In the second half Ellsworth made a noticeable improvement and secured 14 points on her side of the ledger.

The locals, as the score shows, played a fair caliber of basketball. The passing and tries for field baskets were of the sort that wins games. The Ellsworth five, while rather crude at some of the finer points of the game, played praiseworthy ball, considering the fact that the opposition were mostly "old heads."
With a little more practice in team work and basket throwing the Ellsworth boys will be opponents to be considered at all stages of the game.

In a fast game Petoskey on her own court defeated Charlevoix High School 33-11, Friday night. Charlevoix excelled Petoskey in passing and handling the ball, but were unable to get into communication with the basket as systematically as the home team.
Kruk and Sloan starred for Charlevoix.

Under the leadership of Capt. King Saunders, Charlevoix midgets captured a lively basket ball game from the Petoskey dwarfs 12-9 at Petoskey Saturday morning.

Ode to the Grippe.

The following timely verses came to our desk from an unknown writer. The writer evidently has had "it," and we extend our thanks for his graphic description.

Ripety Rip—I've got the grippe!
I know I'm sinking fast.
My poor bones ache as though they'd break;
Wonder how long it'll last.
Bobbity Bob—my pulses throb
A million times a minute;
My neck is sprained, my eyes are strained;
I don't believe I'm in it.
Coughity Cough—my head is off
And pains shoot through my breast;
I shiver and shake; I squirm and quake;
Oh when do I get rest?
I grunt and groan, I writhe and moan,
And then I gasp and sigh;
I strangle and choke, my back is broke;
Great Scott! it seems I'll die.
I can't talk, nor crawl or walk;
I know I'm getting worse;
I cannot eat; I've shaky feet;
Next thing they'll hire a hearse!

THEATRICAL

Mary Pickford in "Behind the Scenes," Noted Theatrical Play.

The inimitable, beloved Mary Pickford's latest characterization is that of the little actress in the well-known drama of theatrical life, "Behind the Scenes," by Margaret Mayo, author of "Baby Mine," and the comedy success of the current theatrical season, "Twin Beds."

Not since "In the Bishop's Carriage" has this fascinating little star appeared in the role of an actress, and her wonderful success in the other production augurs a similar or greater triumph in the present play.

"Behind the Scenes" is an absorbing play that contrasts the drama of life with the glamour of the stage. It is human throughout, and depicts the struggle and sorrows of the little sourette for theatrical fame, and her great sacrifice for love just when success is within reach.

The humorous elements and serious episodes of the drama are faithfully interpreted by Miss Pickford, and punuated with her delightful and original methods. When the stress of the play reaches its crisis, when the little actress, after her years of struggle and poverty, forced to choose between love and success, the star reaches unusual dramatic heights, and gives one of the best performances of her brilliant career. After the inner battle she aban-dons the stage for the man she loves, but the real cost of her decision is plainly written on her expressive face, and the sacrifice intensified by her evident and pathetic longing for the life of the theatre.

"Behind the Scenes" is a story of stage life not exaggeration, not dressed with the clothes of imagination, but true and sincere in its depiction of the miserable failures and the thrilling successes of a theatrical career. And against this entrancing element is balanced the overwhelming love of a man triumphant in this case as it has been throughout many other soul-conflicts.

Miss Pickford is supported by an adequate and capable cast, including James Kirkwood, Lowell Sherman,
Ida Winterman and Russell Bassett.
This production of the Famous Players Film company is in five reels. At the Majestic theatre, January 21.

To the "Roof of America."

Lyman H. Howe's Travel Festival—which comes to the Majestic Theatre Wednesday, February 2nd—pays bigger dividends to every patron for the small investment of 25, or 50 cents than any company, corporation or attraction in existence. That may seem like a broad statement, but, nevertheless, it is very true. The dividends imparted by Howe's Travel Festival are mental.
They illuminate the intellect, heart and mind. It cannot be taken from you.
One of such dividends which spectators of Mr. Howe's new production will receive comes in form of a trip to that tremendous mountainland known as the Glacier National Park on the Continental Divide in the Rocky Mountains. Here a veritable army of peaks from 3,000 to 10,000 feet above sea level are grouped in a region which is aptly called the "roof of America." Atop these mountains are sixty living glaciers that are every bit as inspiring as those ice fields Americans have been crossing to Switzerland in see.

Interpersed with the scenes of the magic of the mountains are film studies of the American Indian of to-day in his native haunts in Glacier National Park.

Throughout the programme is a vein of sparkling comedy films. These come as a welcome and wholesale relief from the ordinary posed so-called comedy of the "slapstick" or "rough house" type and are all the more appreciated for the reason that these films are created exclusively for this exhibition and cannot be seen at any other.

A Chicago lady wrote to a farmer over in Michigan where she spent last summer with her family and told him she would like to come again this summer but that she objected to the kitchen methods of his hired girl and to the swine being kept too close to the house. She received an answer which contained the following: "You may cum all right. Hannah has went, and there hain't been on hogs no the place since you left last summer."

Mulcahy was safe in jail and his wife,
Nora, was telling her neighbor about it.
"And what be the charge agin him, be no charge—they keep him there free."

Two ladies who had known each other in years gone by, met on the street. Both of them were married to musicians. The one a bride of a year, was pushing a baby carriage in which were three fine babies—triplets, all girls. The other lady had been in the bonds of matrimony a couple of weeks.
"What beautiful children," exclaimed the newly-married one with interest.
"Yes," replied the proud mother, "let me tell you the funniest coincidence.
At our wedding supper the boys who played with my husband in the orchestra serenaded him and they played "Three Little Maids" from "The Mikado." Isn't that queer?" At this the newly-married one turned pale. "Mercy," she gasped.
"At our wedding supper Tom's friends serenaded him, also, and they rendered "The Sextette" from "Lucia."

Four Charlevoix fishermen were arrested last week by Game Warden Smith of Petoskey for catching Mackinaw trout in Pine Lake. They were taken before Justice Cooper and sentence was suspended for ten days. Under the present ruling of the game department all trout are protected under the same law as the brook trout and it was under this charge the men were arrested. However, it is now thought no action will be taken and fishermen will be allowed to catch Mackinaws in Pine and Round lakes the same as under the old law.

SCHOOL BUILDING SAFE

City Building Inspector Fred H. Thomas Makes Thorough Inspection.

Some time ago complaint was made to the Board of Education by several patrons of the school, they claiming the high school building was in an unsafe condition. The matter was immediately taken up by board with the state who sent an inspector here to make an examination as to its condition. State Inspector Otwell made a verbal report to the board that the building was in good condition, announcing at that time that his written report would be filed at a later date. This report will be published in full when it arrives.

The matter was also taken up with the council, who ordered City Inspector Fred H. Thomas to make an examination. Following is the report returned by Mr. Thomas to the council:

To the Honorable, the Mayor and Common Council of the City of Charlevoix.

Gentlemen:
I have examined the High School Building in the City of Charlevoix very carefully, and find that, after computing the weight of the materials used in the building and assuming the live load to be 50 pounds per square foot on each floor, the total weight is well within the limit of allowable loads for the piers and footing as constructed.

I do not find there has been any noticeable settlement of the piers or footings, and I find no signs of failure or weakness in them.

Yours very truly,

Fred H. Thomas,
Building Inspector.

Death of Mrs. Sweetland.

Word was received in this city last Friday forenoon, announcing the death of Mrs. Mary J. Sweetland, a former resident of this city and also well known here. At the time of her death, Mrs. Sweetland was confined to the State Hospital at Traverse City, having been adjudged insane and placed in that institution in February, 1912. Mrs. Sweetland was for a number of years a resident of Charlevoix, and owned considerable property in this vicinity. Her remains were taken to Chicago for interment. She is survived by a son and two daughters.

Tri-County Medics Elect.

At a meeting held in Petoskey last week the Antrim, Charlevoix and Emmet County Medical Society elected Dr. John Rycraft of Petoskey, president; Dr. A. Wilkinson of Charlevoix, vice-president; Dr. Geo. Nihart of Petoskey, past president, was elected secretary and treasurer, and Dr. Vardan of East Jordan was elected representative to the state convention.

Cottage Cheese Hint.

In making cottage cheese use an enameled ware colander in which to which to press it. Any milk product is very easily affected by its surroundings, and a metal colander may not only give a flavor, but is apt also to slightly darken the cheese, which should be of snowy whiteness.

After it has thoroughly drained add salt, a good sized piece of butter and a tablespoonful of sweet cream. Mix, cool on ice and serve while fresh.

Handling Poultry.

It is unfeeling to take hens up by the outstretched wings. Put one hand on each side of the body and lift them that way.

The Best Layers.

Long bodied hens are apt to be the best layers. But sometimes those with short bodies surprise folks.

Consider the Bee

The honey comes first, then follows the sting. The Honey of every Purchase comes when you think you are getting a low price. The sting follows when you find that the low price means Low Quality. Some stings make you forget all about the honey and you look for a club. Meanwhile the bee has flown away—he may never sting again—but the first is plenty. You will never get STUNG if you buy yours.

SORE FOOTED SHEEP.

Solution of Blue Vitriol a Standard and Effective Remedy.

This rainy season has encouraged sore feet with sheep. They are never safe with wet footing. Why sheep should be more subject to foot troubles than hogs or cattle cannot tell, says R. A. Mayne in the National Stockman. The recognized standard cure is blue vitriol. It is cheap, safe and easily used, and it matters not much in what form or with what mix it does the work. If enough of it reaches the spot. Get pulverized blue vitriol and mix with water to a thin paste and put on the sore foot with a paddle or a brush. If any part of the hoof has been underlined with the disease the horn must be cut away to sound hoof before putting on the medicine.

One man very successful in curing sore feet always used a quart can half full of strong vitriol water and put such foot in the can, soaking it well. This is an ideal killing for the germs, but it is hard to put the hind feet of a sheep into a can. There is much danger of spilling the medicine and the whole

The early Shropshire possessed horns, but these have since been bred off, and the demand now is for a perfectly polled head in both the male and female. The head is carried erect with much style and strength; it is well covered with wool, having only the outer half of a rather small, clean cut, sensitive ear and a small portion of the nose visible. The legs are medium length, strong and clean cut; they are black in color and partially covered with wool. The face is black or a very dark brown. The sheep shown is a Shropshire wether.

process takes much time. It's quicker to paint the vitriol on while the sheep is down and it is well to get some all over and above the foot.

A most convenient arrangement and one that helps the busy farmer to keep sheep foot troubles in check is a trough containing medicine through which the sheep can be driven, made long enough so that in getting through every foot will get a complete dose. Cases of scaldy feet where the trouble is on the surface can be cured this way without the risk of catching each sheep, and in chronic foot rot after the diseased horn has been pared away and healing started this trough treatment is a satisfactory way to follow up at intervals and complete the cure. Vitriol water is the best thing to use in the trough. It can be made a cheaper dose and possibly as effective to make a thin whitewash with lime and mix in enough blue vitriol to give it a greenish look. An inclined chute to the trough for the sheep to walk out can be made with a door at the end to be opened, allowing the sheep to jump out after standing a short while for the medicine to drain off the feet and back to the trough. Arrangements to get the sheep into the trough fresh from the pasture without mud or filth between the toes must be planned.

SILAGE FOR BEEF COWS.

More Economical Feed For Breeding Cattle Than Blue Grass Pasture.

In connection with the maintenance of breeding herds of cows, the following statement made by Professor H. W. Munford of the Illinois Agricultural college is of interest:

I made a pretty radical statement some years ago that breeding cows could be wintered more cheaply on silage than they could be carried through the summer on blue grass pasture. Many people did not believe it, and they did not let me forget I had said it. I am going to repeat it. On land worth $100 and upward, suitable for growing corn, you can carry breeding cows through the summer cheaper on silage than on blue grass. Not many pastures will carry a cow and her calf on less than one and a half acres. But it is entirely possible to get twelve and one-half to twenty tons of silage from one acre, and you can carry a cow and calf during the summer on two pounds of clover hay and thirty-five pounds of silage per day as well as or better than on blue grass.

Thus you can keep a cow a year and her calf six months on less than a half acre of silage. If eventually Illinois comes to producing its feeding cattle, it will come to use the silage for summer as well as winter feed. I had to show this.

Keep the Horse Cool.
If it is so hot that the horse sweats in the stable at night let him outside, with bedding under him. Unless he cools off during the night he cannot well stand the next day's heat.

ANTRIM COUNTY PROBATE WORK

Summary of Year's Business as Prepared by Judge Harris.

One Hundred and Fifty-Six Cases Heard During Year—Other Information.

I hope the following data will be interesting to the people of our county. Following the custom established seven years ago court has been held on every Monday during the year. There have been 156 hearings during the year. Thirteen insane cases were cared for, eight males and five females and all sent to the State hospital at Traverse City. Five drug cases, two male and three females, were also sent to the hospital with good results. One patient to the State institution at Howell for tuberculosis. One child to Coldwater school (committed but not sent) for adoption purposes. Two girls were sent to Adrain Industrial School. Three boys to the Industrial School at Lansing. Three cases to Lapeer, feeble minded and epileptic. One to Wajamaga, the Farm Colony for epileptics. Four "Mothers' Pension" cases were acted on and pensions granted, making a total of ten cases granted since this law went into effect. Two of these have been revoked, leaving eight in force at present time.

This county is now paying twenty-three dollars per week to eight widows and twenty-one children, these eight families getting from one to five dollars per week. There were fifteen guardianship matters, eleven adoptions confirmed, heirs determined in seven cases, twelve administrators appointed and ten wills admitted to probate and eighteen juvenile cases handled, many being placed on probation. Thirty-seven estates were fully closed and discharges recorded. Every session of the legislature adds new work to the probate office and I am very sure the work has doubled in the past five years. However, work is a pleasure to us, so when at the county seat come in and "work us" and see the nicest probate office in northern Michigan.

Very truly yours,

Ernest R. Harris,

Judge of Probate.

LATE CELERY AND ITS CARE.

Some Varieties Are Cultivated Until the Latter Part of September.

Late varieties are cultivated until the latter part of September, when hauling begins, says M. G. Kahns in the American Agriculturist. Before hauling a cultivator is run between the rows to make the ground flat and loose. Another cultivator, with side shovels, immediately follows to throw the dirt toward the rows. Men then get on their knees between the rows and, holding up the leaves with one hand, with the other shove up a handful of dirt around the bottoms of the plants to hold the leaves in an upright position.

Immediately after the hauling a celery hiller is run between the rows and the dirt thrown up at least six inches high around the plants. Later on the hiller is used again, when the dirt is thrown up as high as possible. Nothing more is done until trenching time. Trenching White Plume celery begins about Oct. 20. The process consists simply in digging a trench about one foot wide and deep enough so that when the celery is placed in the trench the tops will stick out about two inches.

For digging an attachment similar to an onion set harvester and made at the blacksmith's is fastened to a two horse riding cultivator. The celery is then pulled up by hand, most of the dirt shaken from the roots and the broken and decayed leaves and suckers pulled off. It is then carried to the trench, where a man in the trench packs it tightly in an upright position. No dirt is placed around the roots.

The boards used in trenching celery are nailed together in V shape and placed over the trenches to keep off rain and prevent sun and wind from withering the celery. Maturity is then reached in piles along the trenches. The approach of cold weather a little nature is placed along the bottom of the boards, and when the weather becomes very severe more nature is added. Two inches of manure over the boards are usually enough. One of the secrets of keeping celery is to keep the tops dry.

Late Garden Hints.

If the late cabbage is showing a tendency to grow a little too fast and the heads are cracking open bend the plants over to one side and break up the roots on the opposite side of the plant so the growth will be checked. If the cabbage is not to be buried in pits, but used at once in the making of kraut or other winter foodstuffs let the outside leaves grow, as these will make fine green stuff for the hens when vegetation is pretty well gone in the fall.

If you have a good many beans left on the vines, either in the garden or in the corn of the truck patch, pick them and shell them, or gather vines and all and heat them out for winter use. In September is a splendid time to make a cold frame and sow lettuce and radishes for table use early in the winter. Get all the weeds and dead vines out of the garden. It is just as well to burn them, for by doing this you destroy a good many bugs. Sow rye or wheat in the garden, as this will give lots of humus when plowed under, and you can use it as a chicken pasture well up into the winter.—Farm Progress.

Plow Drag.

Here is shown a device recently patented by a Tennessee man to prevent a walking plow from cutting the tines to pieces when it becomes necessary to drag the plow through the yard in plow a little strip of garden, says the Farming Business. There is a slot on the machine. The teeth are attached to a swivel bar just behind the plow and to the handles. A spring from the plow to the bar jerks the bar back when rocks or heavy clods are struck and the bar jerks to the rear of its keeper.

The Need of Lime.

For eight years the Missouri College of Agriculture has maintained seven field experiment stations in various parts of the state. These fields were fairly representative of the level and rolling lands of central and northeast Missouri. One of the most striking facts brought out in the eight years of experimenting was the general need of lime on these prairie soils. It is known that thousands upon thousands of acres of Illinois land are in dire need of lime to neutralize the soil acids. These conditions are not peculiar to the two states mentioned. Lime is a general need. For the man who wants to farm intensively, to grow alfalfa, clovers and other legumes the lime problem is one that must be solved.

Cheerful Inducements.

The following advertisement once appeared in the London Post: "A rock built, coal-baked castle, but feisty by the Atlantic surge, at one of the most romantic and dreaded points of our iron-bound coast, in full view of the Death stone; shipwrecks frequent, corpses common; three reception and seven bedrooms; every modern convenience; 10 guineas a week Address," etc.

Nice Business.

"I think I'll go into the real estate business."
"Looks good to you, eh?"
"Yes; the real estate business seems to be one in which two men can swap property and both make money.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Natural Sequence.

"The prisoner was sunk in dejection."
"What sank him?"
"The fact they couldn't bail him out."

World-Wide Peace is Certain.

We have the assurance of perfect and permanent peace throughout the earth. It is as certain to come as are all things that have been promised or predicted by the never-failing Word. Wars had their beginning in selfishness, and the more selfish humanity becomes the more fully will our world participate in the awful business of war. But the who has promised to make wars to cease is about to finish the task of making a complete and final disposition of sin and selfishness. When this is done, and not until then, we will have world-wide peace.

Man's misconceptions and foundationless hopes of world peace should not obscure the true nature and purpose of the Gospel. Christ as the Prince of Peace (Isaiah 9:6) entered upon his gospel mission, which was to save men from sin and selfishness and restore them to obedience. It is through the power of the gospel that "peace on earth" is assured. "There is no peace . . . to the wicked" (Isaiah 57:21) for the simple reason that selfish men and nations will never cease to serve self to the detriment of others. The foundation of true peace is a nature of love and obedience. "Great peace have they which love Thy law; and nothing shall offend them." (Psalms 119:165.) The peace promised through the gospel not only means world peace, but it is a promise, primarily, of that personal peace, "the peace of God, which passeth all understanding" (Phil. 4:7), by which world peace is to be made possible.

Peace treaties, of whatever number or nature, will not suffice to keep nations of selfish men out of war. Before peace can prevail the world's inhabitants must have the mind turned from self to God. "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee." (Isaiah 26:3.) This text promises perfect peace and the power by which it is to be maintained. When world peace prevails this keeping power of the Prince of Peace will be effective, rather than the restraint of international peace treaties. The promise of this fullness of peace is to be to those men only whose minds are stayed on God. Peace and obedience, peace and righteousness, go hand in hand. "The work of righteousness shall be peace." (Isaiah 32:17.) Without righteousness peace is impossible.

There is to be an end to this present world and to sin and sinners. The common ignorance regarding what the Bible teaches about the reward of the righteous, the fate of sinners and the future of this earth leads to confusion in reference to the promises concerning the end of wars and the time of peace. Sinfulness will continue and increase to the end. Instead of peace, all nations will be involved in a bloody conflict just before the end of the gospel age. The nations now existing will be destroyed. "The heavens and the earth, which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men. . . . But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up." (2 Peter 3:10.)

Here we have the clearest possible proof that the present world is to be purged by fire. The thirteenth verse of the same chapter reads as follows: "Nevertheless we, according to His promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." Here we have a condition promised that will make peace possible. This new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness, will be inhabited by righteous beings only. No place of abode is promised to wicked men, nor have they any promise of peace, but both are the reward of the righteous. "For yet a little while and the wicked shall not be; yea, thou shalt diligently consider his place, and it shall not be. But the meek shall inherit the earth; and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace." (Psalms 37:10-11.)

Very sincerely yours,
Thomas DeMoulpied,
Elder of the Seventh Day Adventist Church.

THE UNIVERSE.

Our Own Stellar System and What May Be Beyond It.

In one of the latest conceptions of astronomers the stellar universe has a diameter of 10,000 to 15,000 light years, with a thickness of 2,000 to 3,000, and our sun has a place a little removed from the center. It embraces 30,000,000 to 50,000,000 stars within the range of telescopic visibility, with dark and invisible bodies whose number cannot be computed.

So far as can be determined the stars are surprisingly uniform in mass, the range of variation being not more than fiftyfold, but in density the range is from more than twice that of the sun to only one-millionth and in absolute luminosity or brightness from 3,000 times that of the sun to about one three-thousandth. The temperature ranges from near absolute zero in the nebulae to 20,000 degrees C. in certain giant hot stars.

It is suggested that our universe may be not the only one and that the small Magellanic cloud, for instance, perhaps 20,000 light years distant, may be a relatively small universe of about 1,000 light years in diameter.

Another separate star system at similar distance is possibly, astronomers hold, the Andromeda nebula.—Newark News

Ants Are Six Eared.

In the matter of some of their sense organs the ants are more than ordinarily endowed. Strange as it may seem, each ant has at least six ears. Aside from this multiplicity of ears, they are located in just about the queerest place imaginable—on the legs. They seem deaf to all sounds made by the vibration of the air, but detect the slightest possible vibrations of solid material. This is supposed to be to their advantage in that such things as approaching footsteps tell more of the possibility of danger than such sounds as are transmitted through the air. So sensitive are their feet that they detect the impact of a small bird shot dropped on the table from a height of about six inches and about fourteen feet distant from an artificial nest placed at the other end of the table.—St. Nicholas.

Take four large oranges, peel carefully, slice and cut into cubes the size of dice. Add an equal amount of pineapple prepared as above, sprinkle with four tablespoonfuls of powdered sugar, two tablespoonfuls of fine chopped mint, one tablespoonful of lemon juice and one tablespoonful of cherry wine. If the pineapple is not fully ripened crush enough to add a tablespoonful of the juice. Stir together lightly to prevent mashing the fruit. Serve in sherbet glasses cold and garnish with candied cherries or fresh cherries or other berries, as preferred.

CURIOUS COINCIDENCE.

An Unexpected Meeting With a Long Lost Set of Dishes.

In the American Magazine the story of a curious coincidence is told in a letter written by Elsie B. Hart of San Gabriel, Cal.

"In the early days in California very little china was used that did not come from the orient. A man whose home was in Folsom, who preferred the china of Europe, took advantage of a visit to England to order a complete dinner set ornamented with a design of his own selection. In the course of time this was packed and shipped to San Francisco by sailing vessel round the Horn, but after long delay the vessel was given up as lost and was never afterward heard from.

"Years afterward the Californian while traveling in China was invited to dine at the home of a missionary. What was his astonishment to find the table set with his own dishes, porcelain so long ago! Concealing his surprise, he commented on the beauty of the china, and this called forth an explanation from his hostess. She told him the china had an interesting history, as it had been washed up on the nearby shore, and they had bought it from the man who had recovered it from the ocean.

"Surprising as it may seem, he never told his host that he was eating off his own dishes."

Bitter Cream.

Question—Why does my cream turn bitter before it sours? I churn every week and the cream is kept in a cold place until the day before I churn. I have been using a quart of buttermilk for a starter.

Answer—All milk and cream contain a greater or less number of bacteria capable of producing good and bad flavors as a result of the fermentations set up by them. If the cream is quickly cooled after separation and then kept at a very low temperature, below fifty degrees, there will be very little growth of these organisms. If the cream is kept a little warmer, say from 50 to 55 degrees, there is likely to be produced bitter flavors due to the growth of certain bacteria which are active at this temperature. Mixing the new, warm cream with the old cream is a possible source of trouble. Around 60 degrees the bacteria which cause the desirable sour flavors are active; and when they get a start the acid produced by them tends to check the growth of the undesirable bacteria. When the bitter flavors are once produced in cream there seems to be nothing short of pasteurization and the use of a large quantity of good starter or excessive washing of the butter which will enable one to get butter of even, passable quality.

Because of the very great importance of temperature regulation in butter making everyone should possess and use a dairy thermometer, which can be purchased for the price of two pounds of butter or less.

Butter Making on the Farm.

On account of several inquiries concerning various phases of butter making it seems best to supplement the above reply with some detailed directions for making good butter on the farm.

Cleanliness First.

We will take for granted that the milk has been drawn under as cleanly conditions as circumstances permit. We will also assume that all dairy utensils and the separator are thoroughly washed and rinsed after each milking. Starting then with the cream fresh from the separator, we will notice a few principles connected with each step in the process.

The Cream Test.

The cream should test from 35 to 45 per cent. Thin cream churns harder, is more bulky to handle, and nothing is gained by dilution of the butter fat. A good separator will skim a thick cream with no loss of fat in the skim milk. Heavy cream also keeps sweet longer, as bacteria grow only in the milk part of the cream.

Care of the Cream.

The fresh cream should be cooled quickly, but not turned at once into the cream can. Have on hand several cream pans besides the cream can used for storage of the cooled cream. After 12 hours the cream may be poured into the cream can and the whole stirred thoroughly. This produces a uniform ripening of the whole mass.

Starters.

Ordinarily a starter is not used on a farm, but if one desires it a quart or more of clean flavored curdled milk or buttermilk may be added to the cream. If it is planned to keep the cream sweet by storing in a cool place the starter should be added the day before churning and the temperature raised to 65 or 70 degrees for one day. The cream will sour sufficiently in this time. The cream should be churned, however, only when it has developed a mildly sour flavor. A few hours before churning cool the cream down to 58-62 degrees, which is generally the correct churning temperature. In some cases, where a bitter flavor does not interfere, a slow ripening from the beginning gives good results. When this is the practice the starter, if used, may be added at the very first.

Churning.

With rich cream, sufficiently ripened, at a temperature of 60 degrees, and a reasonable amount in the churn, butter should come in from 15 to 40 minutes. If less than 15 minutes is required the cream is probably too warm. When more than 40 minutes is required the cream may be too cold, the churn overloaded, or the cream may be too thin. Sweet cream also takes more time to churn. In the case of sweet cream and cream too warm there is liable also to be a considerable loss of fat in the buttermilk.

Stop the churn when the butter has collected into particles the size of small dried peas. By stopping before the butter has been collected into large balls the buttermilk drains out readily, washing is easier and a better quality of butter is secured.

Washing.

The wash water should be of the same temperature as the buttermilk or only a few degrees less. Cold wash water makes crumbly butter which does not take the salt readily. Warm water melts the fat and causes a greasy, salty butter. One washing is generally sufficient. To prevent the butter from collecting into a ball while washing turn the churn over only once or twice very gently. At times, when bad flavors are present, two washings may be necessary, but too much washing removes some of the fine flavors of good butter.

Salting.

After the water has drained away weigh out fine dairy salt, about one ounce for each pound of butter, and wet it. If there is any dirt in the salt add enough water to float off the impurities. Add the wet salt to the butter, either in the churn or in a bowl, and after working a little to evenly spread the salt allow to stand for an hour before the final working and packing. The wet salt will be fully dissolved in this time and the butter will not have had time to harden enough to make the working difficult.

Working.

Working the butter serves to distribute the salt and removes milky water which, if left, would make a streaky product. Don't overwork butter. When ready to pack it should be waxy in appearance and granular on a broken surface.

Notice to Ice Cutters

People cutting ice this season on either Pine or Round Lakes are warned to take special precaution in protecting the public against the danger of driving or walking into sections where ice cutting operations are taking place. All persons engaged in this work will be required to fence in the fields where they are cutting, not by simply using blocks of ice, but by completely fencing in all open places. Fish holes on Round Lake must also be protected in the same manner. All neglect in this respect will be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law.

Remember Thursday, January 20, is the next meeting. All please be present, as there will be installation of officers and a good supper.

WARNS FARMERS

Well Known Veterinary Says Not to Feed Horses Frosted Silage.

Dr. J. M. Raynor has issued a warning to farmers in western Michigan against feeding their horses and cattle silage which was cut after the killing frosts which visiting this vicinity last fall as it is liable to have moulded, and is likely to poison the stock to which it is fed. The only safe way to feed the silage now, according to Dr. Raynor, is to kiln dry it. The corn which kills the horses was frozen before it ripened. A mould formed at the base of the kernel on the cob, and it is of a poisonous nature, and when fed to stock is sure to result in death.

A FOOL AND HIS MONEY

at it is a liberal way. Besides, she hasn't a husband. She's chucked him Good riddance, too. Now, do you imagine for a single instant that a beautiful, adorable young woman of twenty-three is going to spend the rest of her life without a man? Not much. She's free to marry again, and she will."

"Admitting that to be true, why should she marry me?"

"I didn't say she was in love with you. I said you were in love with her."

"Oh," I said, and my face fell. "I see."

He seemed to be considering something. After a few seconds he nodded his head decisively. "Yes, I am sure of it. If the right man gets her she'll make the finest, sweetest wife in the world. She's never had a chance to show what's really in her. She would be adorable, wouldn't she?"

The sudden question caught me unawares.

"She would," I said, with conviction.

"Well," said he slowly and deliberately, "why don't you set about it, then?"

He was so ridiculous that I thought for the first time I'd humiliated him.

"Assuming that you are right in regard to my feelings toward her, Fred, what leads you to believe that I would stand a chance of winning her?" It was a silly question, but I declare I hung on his answer with a tenseness that surprised me.

"Why not? You are good looking, a gentleman, a celebrity and a millionaire's son. She could do worse."

"But you forget that I am—let me see—thirty-five, and she is but twenty-three."

"No offset that, she has been married and unhappy. That brings her about up to your level, I should say. Her father ought to pay what he owes. He gave a million to get one husband for her. He ought to give a million to be rid of him, so that she could marry the next one without putting him to any expense, whatsoever. I told her I thought it was the cheapest and quickest way out of it, and she said, 'I wonder!'"

"Have you been discussing her most sacred affairs with her, you blithering fool?"

"No, sir," said he, with dignity. "She has been discussing them with me."

I had no recollection of what I said as I stalked out of the room. He called after me, somewhat pleadingly, "I thought!"

"Ask Britton what he has to say about it."

Things had come to a pretty pass. Couldn't a gentleman be polite and agreeable to a young and charming girl whose circumstances had thrown in his way without having his motives misconstrued by a lot of suspicious, idiotic menials whose only zest in life sprang from a temperamental tendency to belittle the big things and enlarge upon the small ones?

Unexpectedly I met Britton.

"Britton, what's all this gossip I hear going the rounds of the castle behind my back?" I exclaimed.

"Confound him, he looked pleased? 'It's quite true, sir; quite true.'"

"Quite true?" I roared. "What's quite true, sir?"

"Isn't it, sir?" he asked, dismayed.

"What?"

"I mean to say, sir, isn't it true?"

"My God!" I cried, throwing up my hands in hopeless despair. "You—you walk! I'm going to get to the bottom of this. I want the truth, Britton. Who put it into that confounded head of yours that I am—in love with the countess? Speak! Who did it?"

He lowered his voice, presumably because I had dropped mine to a very loud whisper. I also had glanced over both shoulders.

"Begging your pardon, sir, but I must be honest, sir. It was you as first put it into my head, sir."

"I?" My face went the color of a cardinal's cap.

"You, sir. It's as plain as the nose on your face."

"That will do, Britton," I commanded. He remained discreetly silent.

"That will do, I say," I repeated some what testily. "Do you hear, sir?"

"Yes, sir," he responded. "That will do, you say?"

"Ahem!" I ahem!

Five minutes later I was at her door. My heart in my mouth. A sudden, unexpected turn of panic took possession of me.

After some deliberation I came to a decision. The proper thing for me to do was to show all of them that their calumnious suspicions were wrong. Resolutely I marched downstairs.

For some two long and extremely monotonous days I toiled. I could not deny to myself that I was missing those pleasant hours with the countess. I did miss them. I missed Rosemary and Jinko and Helen Marie Louise Antoinette and Blake.

Blatchford came to the door.

"A note for you, sir. If you please," said he. He was holding the salver almost on his nose.

My heart, my incomprehensible heart—gave a leap that sent the blood rushing to my face.

"Thank you, Blatchford; that will do."

"I beg your pardon, sir, but there is to be in it, sir."

"Oh!" said I.

I tore open the envelope. I managed to dash off a brief note in a fairly comical manner. Blatchford almost committed the unpardonable crime of slamming the door behind him, he was in such a hurry to be off with the message.

Then I went over and stood above Mr. Poopendyke.

"Mr. Poopendyke," said I slowly, darkly, "what do you know about those violets?"

He quailed. "I hope you don't mind, Mr. Smart. It's all right. I put one of your cards in so that there couldn't be any mistake."

Halfway up the winding stairway I paused in some astonishment. It had just occurred to me that I was going up the steps two at a time and that my heart was beating like mad.

I reflected. Here was I racing along like a schoolboy, and for what? What occasion was there for such unseemly haste? In the first place, it was now but a few minutes after 11, and she had asked me for luncheon. There was no getting around that. At best luncheon was two hours off. So why was I galloping like this? The series of self-inflicted questions found me utterly unprepared. I couldn't answer one of them.

After ten minutes of serious, undisturbed consideration of the matter I came to the final conclusion that it was not love, but pity, that had driven me to such abnormal activity. It was nonsense to even argue the point.

For an hour and a half by my watch, but five or six by my nerves, I paced the lonely, sequestered halls in the lower regions of the castle. Two or three times I was sure that my watch had stopped, the hands seemed so stationary. The third time I tried to wind it I broke the mainspring, but as it was nearly 1 o'clock not much harm was done.

That one little sentence, "Have you deserted me?" grew to be a voluminous indictment. I could think of nothing else. There was something incredibly sad and pathetic about it. Had she been unhappy because of my beastly behavior?

At last I approached her door. Upon my soul, my legs were trembling. I experienced a silly sensation of fear. I hesitated, then, plucking up my courage and putting all silly questions behind me, I rapped resolutely on the door.

The excellent Hawkes opened it. I started back in dismay. He stood aside impressively.

"Mr. Smart?" he announced.

I caught sight of the countess. She was arranging some flowers on the table. Blatchford was placing the knives and forks. Helen Marie Louise Antoinette stood beside her mistress holding a box of flowers in her hands.

What was it that I had been thinking on there in those gloomy halls? That she would greet me with a pathetic, hard look and—

"Good morning!" she cried gayly. "Hurt? Pathetic? She was radiant!"

"So glad to see you again. Hawkes has told me how busy you've been."

"Awfully, awfully busy," I murmured. Was it relief at finding her so happy and unconcerned that swept through me? I am morally but shamelessly certain it wasn't.

"Don't you think the roses are lovely in that old silver bowl?"

"Exquisite!"

"Blatchford found it is the plate vault," she said, standing off to admire the effect. "Do you mind if I go on arranging them?" she asked, and without waiting for an answer resumed her employment.

"Bon jour, m'sieur," said Helen Marie Louise Antoinette over her mistress' shoulder. One never knows whether a French maid is polite or merely spiteful.

"It seems ages since I saw you last," said the countess in a matter of fact tone, jiggling a rose into position and then standing off to study the effect. Her head cocked prettily at an angle of inquiry.

It suddenly occurred to me that she had got on very well without me during the ages. The discovery irritated me. She was not behaving at all as I had expected.

"There hasn't been a great deal of news," I said.

"Thank you," she said. "Oh, did it prick you?"

"Yes," said I dully. Then we both gave the closest attention to the end of my thumb, while I triumphantly squeezed a tiny drop of blood out of it. I sucked it. The incident was closed. She was no longer interested in the incertation.

"So you thought I had deserted you?" I said, and was a little surprised at the gruffness in my voice.

"The violets appeased me," she said, with a smile. For the first time I understood that she was wearing a large bunch of them. "You will be bankrupt, Mr. Smart, if you keep on buying roses and violets and orchids for me."

So the roses were mine also! I shot a swift glance at the mantelpiece. It resistibly moved by some mysterious force. There were two bowls of orchids there.

"But they are lovely!" she cried, noting the expression in my face and misinterpreting it. "You are an angel!"

That was the last straw. "I am nothing of the sort," I exclaimed, very hot and uncomfortable.

"You are," was her retort. "There isn't it a lovely centerpiece? Now you must come and see Rosemary. She adores the new elephant you sent to her."

"Ele?" I began, blinking my eyes.

"Oh—oh, yes, yes! Ha, ha! The elephant! Good heavens! Had that idiot Poopendyke started a menagerie in my castle?"

I was vastly relieved to find that the elephant was made of felt and not too large to keep Rosemary from widdling it skillfully in an assault upon the hapless Jinko.

"I beg your pardon, sir, but there is

Cases where warrants have been issued but were not served, or dismissed before examination, are not reported.

CITIZENS ASKED TO AID IN WORK

Boys Canvassing City for Funds to Equip Their Club Rooms.

Estimated Annual Cost of Maintenance Will Amount to Not Over $250.00

A complete canvass of the city is being made by the Club Room Boys soliciting funds. Nearly $900.00 is wanted to pay for their equipment, only a part of which has been installed to date.

This equipment when installed and paid for becomes the property of the club. None of it belongs to the Baptist church or to me. Legal documents have been drawn up which makes the boys' club the sole owner of all equipment and their manager is only trustee for same. Should the work be discontinued in the parlors of the church, then the organization, through its executive board or directors, may remove the entire equipment elsewhere.

This is quite a large sum of money to ask the public for, but the greater cost is the first year, for after this year not more than $250.00 will be necessary annually to meet expenses.

Charlevoix citizens subscribed $1067.50 for the "Y" last year. Now if they will be so liberal with us this year, our work will become permanently founded.

Under my supervision the boys will handle their own money and keep their own books, thus making the whole work an "open book" to the public.

This is a great work. I am glad to have the opportunity of giving my best efforts to it and earnestly request the co-operation of all.

Yours for the Boys,
Lloyd C. Vinyard.

COUNTY FARMERS' INSTITUTE AT IRTONTON FEBRUARY 4-5

L. R. Taft of State Agricultural College at Lansing One of the Leading Speakers—Interesting Programme Prepared—One-Day Institutes February 7 to 12.

The annual meeting of the Charlevoix County Farmers' Institute will be held at Ironton Friday and Saturday, February 4th and 5th, at the Grange Hall, in charge of the following officers and speakers: Grant Hammond, Master of Ironton Grange, chairman; H. L. Barnum of Ironton, acting secretary of the County Farmers' Institute Society; L. R. Taft of the Agricultural College at Lansing, State Superintendent of Farmers' Institutes; George Bender of Big Rapids, conductor, and E. H. Clark of East Jordan, local manager. On account of the unfortunate death of President Herbert Olney, Mr. Hammond of Ironton has consented to act as chairman of the meeting, and H. L. Barnum of Ironton will fill the place of secretary.

Every farmer who pays taxes should turn out to the meetings. These meetings represent an attempt of the state to increase the field of influence and usefulness of the State Agricultural College. Farmers of the state through their taxes help to support the college and pay the wages of the institute workers. That is why the meetings are free. The institute does not represent an opportunity to get something for nothing, for what good you get from them you have already paid for. Every one should come out and, by asking questions, get his money's worth.

Bring the whole family and the hired man. A special meeting for women will be held in the Gleaner Hall at Ironton, February 4th in the afternoon. May L. Stewart, County Commissioner of Schools, prepared the program and it is a good one. Don't miss the demonstration in vegetable cooking by Mrs. Noecker.

By all means bring the boys. There's a reason. These meetings are truly inspirational and the insight a boy will get into the Big Business of farming will put contentment into his heart and a vision of better farming into his head. After all, the problem of keeping boys on the farm concerns itself largely with the boy's visions. Give him an opportunity to fill his head with visions which will lead him back to, rather than away from, the farm home.

Why keep the hired man at home on these occasions? By attending he will increase his efficiency and you will be the gainer. A laborer with an inspiration is worth two without.

And now, Mr. Farmer, please don't forget that advertising, postage, transportation, etc., cost money. The officers who give a week or more of their time get no pay. The quarter you pay when you join the County Institute Society is used only for necessary local expenses. Membership in the society entitles one to a vote at the annual meeting, which will be held this year in the Grange Hall at Ironton February 5th during the noon hour. Owing to the recent death of President Herbert Olney and the resignation of Secretary Howe, new officers must be selected. Membership also entitles one to all the publications of the State Experiment Station as they are issued and to the big report of the Round-Up Institute held at East Lansing February 28-March 4.

Following is the program as prepared:

All institute meetings are free. Come early and bring the whole family. Potluck dinner at the grange hall each day.

A 300-Page Book Free.
Every farmer is invited to join the County Institute Society. The annual fee is only 25 cents, which is used to defray local expenses. Members have their names placed on the mailing list for Experiment Station publications and in addition are sent free a 300-page book containing the addresses and discussions given at the Agricultural College during Farmers' Week, February 28-March 4. Here are some of the topics discussed in last year's book:

Invalid Cookery, The School Lunch Box, How to Choose and Care for Clothing, Feeding Poultry for Egg Production, Preparation of Spraying Mixtures, Onion Culture, Sweet Clover for Michigan, Soil Judging, etc.

To have this book and be able to read it slowly at one's leisure is better than spending $10.00 to attend the round-up. Only 25 cents, payable at any session of the county or any one-day institute, makes one a member of the Institute Society and entitles him to the book.

One Day Institutes.
Mr. J. B. Brown of Tawas City, who was so well liked last year, has been re-engaged to conduct the one-day institute this year. Mr. Brown is not only a very successful live stock feeder and breeder but he is one of the most popular entertainers on the Institute force. Everyone, old and young, is invited to come out and enjoy a day of profit and pleasure.

Marion Center, Grange Hall, February 7, 1916.
Maple Grove, Grange Hall, February 8, 1916.
Pine Lake, Grange Hall, February 9, 1916.
Deer Lake, Grange Hall, February 10, 1916.
Clarion, February 11, 1916.
Springvale, Town Hall, February 12, 1916.

On Wednesday, February 9th, under the auspices of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, a supper will be served for the benefit of the "Boys' Club." All who are interested in the boys will be given an opportunity to assist. Remember the date and watch for particulars later. Adv. 411.

80 PRESENT AT POMONA GRANGE

First Meeting a Success Despite the Unfavorable Weather.

State Speaker Coon, While Late in Arriving, Made Stirring Address to Grangers.

The special Pomona meeting of the Charlevoix County Pomona Grange, held with Pine Lake Grange January 21st, was a decided success as a grange "get-together" meeting. While the weather was very unfavorable and the roads bad, members from the following granges were present: Ironton, Wilson, Peninsula, Harmony, Deer Lake, Boyne River, Maple Grove and Pine Lake.

The meeting was called to order at 11 o'clock by Master E. E. Stroud and opened in the fifth degree. Just eighty persons sat down to dinner at 1 o'clock, after which six candidates were initiated in that degree.

The state speaker failed to arrive until very late, which was a decided disappointment to all, but a program had been previously prepared with subjects that were to be handled by Mr. Coon which was a credit to the home talent and ability.

Space will not permit a detailed account of the program, but it was in the whole instructive and very interesting.

State Speaker Coon arrived about 6 o'clock and talked for about forty-five minutes, briefly outlining the year's work and other matters of interest to the grange. Mr. Coon has a pleasing personality and those who did not stay to hear him regret that he could not have had more time to spend with the members.

HINKLEY FOR STATE SENATOR

Emmet County Man Announces That He Will Be In Race.

Has Received Substantial Assurances of Support from All Points in the District.

When asked if he was going to become a candidate for state senator from this, the 29th senatorial district, comprised of the counties of Emmet, Charlevoix, Cheboygan, Alpena, Otsego, Presque Isle and Montmorency, Representative D. H. Hinkley of this city made this statement:

"I am looking over the ground with a view of possibly being a candidate for state senator. I have received substantial assurances of support in many places and will make a decision shortly."

This throws a new light on the political outlook from this part of the state and also on the possible character of the next state senate. Mr. Hinkley has been sent to the house of representatives three times from Emmet county and each time has made a name for himself among the legislators. For four years he has been chairman of the ways and means committee and introduced the only bill having a view of preparing a budget system for Michigan.

Mr. Hinkley is without doubt the best informed man on the budget system proposition in Michigan, and the press of the state have long since recommended him to the voters as the man to lead the fight in the next legislature for this same budget system he recommended some time ago.

Recognized as the leader in this cause for which so many are asking, it seems that he could be used to wonderful advantage in the senate, and those who have been asking for a budget system should get behind a movement to assure his being sent there for the next legislatures.—Petoskey Evening News, January 20.

The voters of the 29th senatorial district of Michigan will have to go over the entire district with a fine-tooth comb to find a cleaner or more able man to fill this important position than D. H. Hinkley of Petoskey. His record as representative from his home district for three consecutive terms is convincing evidence that his constituents have the utmost confidence in his ability and that they will support him almost to a man. In case he enters the race, and we believe he will, Charlevoix county will give him a handsome vote, as well as the entire district. Later—Just as we go to press we received a letter direct from Mr. Hinkley, announcing that he would be a candidate. There is no question but Mr. Hinkley will put up a good clean campaign.

The ladies of the Baptist church will hold a baked goods sale and serve lunches Saturday afternoon and evening, January 29th, in the Yettaw confectionery store building. Adv. 411

Merchants Must Face Mail Order Competition

Live Wires Educate People To Do Their Trading at Home and Save Vexatious Delays.

The parcel post has resulted, as was generally expected, in a large increase of the mail order business. Some merchants bewail this condition, and never cease to complain about the unfairness of the system that provides such easy facilities for this form of trade.

Other merchants, instead of complaining, imitate the mail order methods with great success. They start a campaign for educating the people along the country roads about the advantages they get by buying in nearby centers. They show them how the near-home store simply has to keep only substantial and reliable goods, or it could never hold its trade.

Also they can often get their goods the day they order them, and if the stuff does not prove as represented, satisfaction is guaranteed. They do not have to go through with the vexatious process of trying to get satisfaction out of some vast impersonal machine of a great mail order house.

The bulk of the trade that goes to mail order houses would go to stores near home, if people knew what the home store has to sell. The local news paper is both catalog and solicitor for the home merchant, and the one means by which he can beat the big mail order concern.

Proper Way to Plant Young Fruit Trees

All Trees Should Be Set Thirty-two Feet Apart—Great Care Must Be Taken in Spreading Roots.

After twenty years of experience, how I plant young fruit trees:

Do not set your apples and sweet cherries less than 32 feet apart. Sour cherries and peaches would stand a little less.

Never plant any fillers between your rows of trees. I've seen this a failure a good many times.

In planting set a line of stakes 20 feet from your line fence for your team to turn on.

Stake your land out 32 feet apart each way. Now commence and dig your holes 8 inches deep and wide enough to take in all the roots. Dig a row straight through to the end. Then get a bunch of trees, lay one beside each hole and start to plant. Pick your tree up in your left hand, trim the roots, turn your tree and trim the top, leaving three short stubs from 6 to 8 inches long.

Don't forget when digging your holes to put the first spading on one side, the bottom dirt on the other. Now we are ready for planting the first tree.

Fill in 3 inches of loose dirt, make a mound in center, take your tree in left hand, get down on your knee and sight for stakes both ways. Spread the roots all over this mound and press down hard, put more loose dirt in and tramp lightly. Now for your bottom dirt: Fill in and tramp solid, leaving the bud even with the ground. One more shovelful of loose dirt thrown around the tree for mulch. Now get there as fast as you can work to keep the roots from drying out.

Dig another row through and follow with your trees. I've been very successful in keeping my trees straight both ways. All done by the simple twist of the neck. Now that your orchard is planted, look after it. When you find a tree loose-plum it up and tramp it tight. For three years dig around them and you will have a No. 1 orchard.

Shade Trees.
Just a word about pruning and taking care of them.

To day we have beautiful trees along our streets and highways. Our duty is to keep them so by pruning off all the drooping limbs and dead wood and shaping the tree up where needed.

Trees that are too thick with brush in the center and stand close to your house or buildings furnish one of the best breeding places for spiders, insects, lice, etc., which will soon destroy the leaves of your trees, ruining them. Look well after your shade trees before it is too late. Better cut them down than have a diseased, dying tree.

AN ACT OF KINDNESS

A Charlevoix Resident Speaks Publicly for the Benefit of Charlevoix People.

If you had suffered tortures from kidney trouble.

Had experimented with different remedies without relief.

If you were finally cured through a friend's suggestion—

Wouldn't you be grateful?

The following statement has been given under just circumstances:

Mr. Newman has used Doan's Kidney Pills.

He publicly tells of the benefit he has received.

He is a simple act of kindness to other Charlevoix sufferers:

No need to experiment with such convincing evidence at hand.

Mr. Newman speaks from experience. You can rely on what he tells you.

Henry Newman, 208 Sheridan Street, Charlevoix, says: "I have been troubled for years by my kidneys. I was annoyed by frequent passages of kidney secretions at night and I also had backache. I read of Doan's Kidney Pills and got a box at the Ivy Drug Store. They gave me great relief. I can now rest better and I don't have much backache."

Price 50c. at all dealers. Don't simply ask for a kidney remedy—get Doan's Kidney Pills—the same that Mr. Newman had. Foster-Milburn Co., Props., Buffalo, N. Y.

EVELINE.

January 16, 1916.

Two more scholars for my teacher in District No. 5.

John Goodmanson returned to Boyne City last Sunday.

John and Chris Knudsen are sawing logs for Lawrence Jensen.

Joseph Mitchell is hauling logs on the Jensen log haul to Phelps.

Chris Lynkkip is visiting with his mother during the cold stormy weather.

F. H. Skow of Ellsworth is having his hemlock logs hauled to that village.

The Eveline is up on the ways for repairs. She will remain idle until some time in March.

H. Brock has a force of men and teams at work hauling stones for the county road building.

Matthew Saunders lost a fine yearling colt last week. The cause of its death was indigestion.

January 23, 1916.

Charles Dean spent Sunday with his brother Datus.

No mail man for three days in succession on account of the severe snow storm.

Pansy Hammond is assisting Mrs. Clinton Bowen, who has an attack of the gripe.

Claud Howen has been quite ill with a severe cold, which nearly resulted in pneumonia.

Emil Nasson and Frank Hammond attended the Pomona meeting January 21, held with Pine Lake grange.

The windstorm Saturday broke a good many forest trees and fruit trees as well. In one instance telephone communication was cut for about an hour.

The Farmers' Institute Round Up will be held at the Grange Hall, February 4 and 5. Woman congress will be held at the school building on the afternoon of the fifth.

Everett Orvis returned from Ann Arbor last week where he underwent a difficult operation on his eye. His eye sight has been improved to a marked degree. He will be obliged to have another operation performed.

Cut rates on all daily papers and magazines. It means money to you to renew your subscriptions at the Courier office.

This is the Stove Polish YOU Should Use

It's different from others because more care is taken in the making and the materials used are of higher grade.

Black Silk Stove Polish

Makes a brilliant, silky polish that does not rub off or dust off, and the shine lasts four times as long as ordinary stove polish. Used on sample stoves and sold everywhere at grocery dealers.

All you ask is trial. Use on your cook stove, and you will find it the best stove polish you ever used. You will be glad to get it and you will be glad to get it.

HOPYARD

Bessie Peaslee is editor this week. The little folks have been drawing birds and coloring them.

Fourth and Fifth grades had semester examinations this week.

George Haggerty and Bessie Peaslee are housekeepers this week.

Over half of our school was absent this week. Reason? They had lagrippe.

Five pupils received large certificates this month for being neither absent or tardy for four months.

Only nine pupils out of twenty-two will receive certificates this month. We are sorry to decrease our percentage but it couldn't be helped.

The seventh and eighth grades were unable to have their semester examinations Thursday and Friday as nearly all the class was sick with lagrippe.

See my $35.00 team harness, brass trimmed at Benj. Brown's.—Adv. 51tf.

Johnson School District

Lillian Guild has entered school again, after an absence of three weeks.

Jay Adams hurt himself quite badly last week while unloading coal.

The third, fifth and eighth grades have begun work in their reading classics.

Florence and Marian McGhan have entered school, making our enrollment nineteen now.

On account of the grippe and bad weather the attendance has not been very large lately.

Miss Bessie Allen attended the meeting of "The Teacher's Reading Circle Class" in Charlevoix last Saturday.

The pencil sharpener which we earned by selling pencils is now in our school room and we are very proud of it.

Suffrage Notes

The senate committee on woman suffrage, of which Senator Thomas of Colorado is chairman, reported favorably on the nationwide suffrage amendment. There was only one dissenting vote, and that was of Senator Catron of New Mexico, the state in which an interpreter has to translate the speeches of the Spanish-speaking members of the state legislature. The report says:

"In our opinion every argument upon which universal manhood suffrage rests, demands the extension of its privileges and responsibilities to women. They are subject to the laws, are taxed for the support of government, and subject with men to a common political destiny. They are citizens in all other respects. In patriotism, intelligence, devotion to welfare of the government and in capacity for franchise they are in no wise inferior to men."

Four prominent Democrats, including Speaker Champ Clark, spoke in favor of equal suffrage at the annual convention of the Women's National Democratic League in Washington, D. C., recently. The only point where difference of opinion prevailed among the various speakers was with regard to the way of extending suffrage to women, whether by national or the state-by-state method.

Suffrage sentiment is gaining rapidly in the south, which was only a few years ago solidly anti-suffrage. Two towns in Florida have recently granted municipal suffrage to women. The towns are Cocoa and Fellsmere. "To many the idea of municipal suffrage for women is new—here, at least," said the Cocoa News recently. "But the people are aware of the importance of the growing demand all over the world for woman suffrage."

Cold Settled In His Back

"Foley Kidney Pills always give me prompt relief."—Ed Valton, Rogers, Neb. Ed Valton, of Rogers, Neb., writes: "I have used Foley Kidney Pills for backache, the result of catching cold which settled in my back. Foley Kidney Pills always give me prompt relief and I can cheerfully recommend them."

The reason Foley Kidney Pills act so satisfactorily is because they neutralize and dissolve the poisonous waste matter that remains in the blood because the kidneys do not do their work properly in filtering and casting out from the system uric acid and other poisons.

Relief usually follows in a few days and such symptoms as pain in the sides or back, stiff joints, aching muscles, rheumatism, too frequent action of the bladder at night, and other painful and annoying ailments disappear. Foley Kidney Pills contain no harmful ingredients. They are as safe as well as quick acting.

Save Immature Corn.

The interests of planting the slow growing season and heavy rains all point toward a large percentage of immature corn this fall. What are you going to do with your soft corn? Are you prepared to "can it?"

The live stock farmer can profitably utilize this soft corn by putting it in silos. The silo is an investment which pays high interest on the live stock farm. The man who has no silo will have to do the best he can.—M. A. R. Kelley, Missouri Station.

DUAL PURPOSE COWS COMING INTO FAVOR

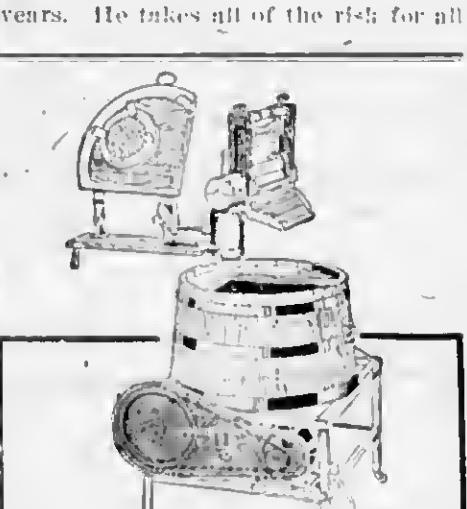

I believe the dual purpose cow should come to her own, writes R. L. Dimick in the American Agriculturist. There are several breeds to be chosen from, foremost among which I would mention the Shorthorns and the Red Polled. Many cows of these breeds are equal to the average of the special purpose cows as regards dairy production, while for meat purposes they are worth two or three times as much. They will make a profit of from $10 to $50 per year at the pail and not milk much over two-thirds of the time while making nearly or quite as much in the production of beef. They are more hardy and will thrive on a ration that would return nothing whatever if fed to the special purpose cows. The general run of farmers are the ones that I believe will make the most money out of the dual purpose breeds.

To most such farmers the advantage of dairying at all is that it brings in money every month. The pure beef farmer gets his money only once a year, or, if we consider the individual animals, he only gets his money from them once in about two and a half years. He takes all of the risk for all that time, and if he loses an animal it is all loss. On the other hand, the farmer who sells milk is pretty sure of some profit from his animals. If there happens to be a night or an unproductive animal of the dual purpose class it is valuable for meat, while if the same thing occurs with the special purpose cow she is not worth raising or feeding.

Red Polled cattle are of a uniform red color; the tip of the tail and the under may be white. When crossed on other breeds the color is generally transmitted. They are hardy. They are easy keepers, being smooth and due in bone and muscle, hardy and thrifty, mature early, fatten easily and make best of the very best quality. They are gentle and docile. It is very rare that a bull ever gets cross. The cows are superior milkers. They give a good quantity of very rich milk, and many of them never go dry. The cows have good udders, with teats of good size. The cow pictured is a Red Bull.

There are those who believe that there is no such breed as a dual purpose breed and that such a breed has to be developed before we can get it. The Red Polled and certain strains of Shorthorns have been bred for milk and beef for many generations, and some of the finest producers in the world are of those breeds, while almost any individual of them will give a heavy flow of milk for a shorter period than the special dairy animals.

Contagious Abortion.

Contagious abortion is one of the worst diseases that can get into a herd. It is even worse than tuberculosis, says the Kansas Farmer. When a cow aborts a good veterinarian should be called at once. There are remedies that are said to be effective, but prevention must be relied upon to keep it from spreading. Too often when a case occurs in a herd the owner is tempted to conceal it, sometimes even selling the affected cow to a neighbor, thus spreading the disease over a wider area. Affected cows are often shipped to the central stockyards and are reshipped to the country to innocent purchasers. In many instances where this disease has gained a foothold it has been necessary for the man to go out of the cattle business for a year or two and start afresh. No chances should be taken with an aborting cow. Every case should be treated as a case of infectious abortion.

Lice on Cattle.

Clean up the stable and disinfect it with a 5 per cent solution of coal tar disinfectant, then give it a coat of fresh made lime wash having an addition of one pound of chloride of lime to three gallons of wash. Include floors and ceiling. Similarly treat all objects upon which the cattle rub. The stable should be light and perfectly ventilated.

School Commissioner's Notes

Did Obidiah say that was all talk about "Standard School?" We'll wait and see, but say, while we wait, let's work.

Mid-year examination questions sent to all rural teachers for the 20th and 21st. The highest average in each township and the highest average in the county with the name of the student in each case will be published in this paper as soon as the returns are in.

The four month certificates for perfect attendance and punctuality are being sent out daily now. So far Three Bella has the banner record,—25 certificates out of 29 belonging.

At the officers' meeting Mr. Otwell spent the morning on new points in school law and the afternoon on the causes that underlie the movement for "Standard Schools." This is being done in every county in the state. In Emmet county eleven directors immediately stepped forward to ask that their school room be inspected so that they might know how to proceed at once.

Did you know, teachers, that Boyne City faculty is maintaining an extension school? This means that any teacher and her students will furnish a program for you free of charge any time you send for them. If your noon lunches are cold, if your recess periods could be filled in with a little woodwork, basket weaving, or sewing, if your agriculture class do not realize that they are studying real live things, and they do not understand seed selection, breeding for types, the Babcock tester, or farm accounting, why put it up to the other fellows. Give Boyne City a chance to help you. Here is something for nothing only Mr. Wheaton suggests that boys like refreshments and that a little music would be all right. They will furnish the rest and you may charge admission if you want to; they claim no dividends until, well, that depends a little bit on the lyceum bureau.

Farmers' Round-up Institute at Iron-ton, February 14th and 15th. If teachers and students could both turn out, we should be glad to call this "Patrons' Day."

The entire series of farmers' institutes is the best time ever to talk "Standard School." The commissioner is going to use this opportunity to follow up the circular letter sent recently to all school officers.

Dr. Bryan sent in the titles to his three addresses for the teachers institute for February 17. We hear that he is a whole institute in himself.

If it shall appear that the Carranza government refused necessary guard for the sixteen Americans who were massacred near Chihuahua, popular sentiment in America will demand, that President Wilson abandon all that's left of policy of "watchful waiting" at once.

A year or two ago the administration warned Americans to get out of Mexico. Drastic action because of what happened to those who rejected that warning would not have been popularly commended.

Within recent months, guarantees of protection to American lives and property having given, the administration has recognized a de facto government in Mexico. Failure or refusal to live up to those guarantees removes Carranza from recognition and justifies our government in personally protecting American lives and property in Chihuahua, or in the heart of the City of Mexico.

It is Carranza's first duty to protect American lives in Mexico. Instead of putting down the hands of bandits and making successful war on the disordered forces of Villa, he spends his time on excursions from point to point, distributing civil favors to his favorites and letting the populace admire his magnificent whiskers.

These Americans who were stripped, beaten and butchered in Chihuahua, were there by right of guarantee of protection. If the effeminate de facto government of Mexico cannot preserve to Uncle Sam his guarantees, Uncle Sam ought to preserve them by his own powers.

The watchful waiting policy is too thoroughly soaked with American blood!

ADVOCATES of a budget system for Michigan seem to believe that they will succeed in getting their plan adopted some time, even if the legislature is opposed to the idea. It is a foregone conclusion that the taxpayers would be a great deal better off under such a system, but the politicians stand to lose by the introduction of such a modern method of doing state business. The adoption of the plan depends upon which are the stronger in the state—the politicians or the people.

Thus early in the year candidates are appearing in force for the state offices and the indications are that there will be a large number in the field for the nominations for governor of Michigan. State offices seem to have an allurements about them even if the incumbents cannot make a reputation for efficiency under the present system of government.

It is estimated that American consumers of sugar paid $100,000,000 extra because of the increased price of that article during 1915. This is of interest in connection with the Democratic promise of reduced cost of living.

That Last Chapter

How a Detective Story Was Finished.

By F. A. MITCHEL

"Hello!"
"Well?"
"Are you Mr. MacKinnon?"
"Yes. What is it?"
"I'm Hayden, composing room. The last chapter of that detective story is missing."

"Missing?"
"Yes."
"Great Scott! What are we to do? Connolly read it, and I sent up the manuscript just as I received it from him. You say it is a detective story?"
"Yes. That's what the title indicates."

Here was a beautiful situation. A detective story with the last chapter missing! Connolly was the only person connected with the office who had read it, and he had gone away. I ordered a search made for the missing chapter without success. Nothing remained but the author. I called to the telephone operator, "Give me No. 2078 Penfield."

It seemed an hour, though it was but forty seconds, before I heard a click, and a woman's voice answered:
"Well?"

"Is this Miss Quigley?"
"This is Miss Quigley's home, but she's not here. She called this morning for Japan."

The groan I gave was doubtless audible to the woman on the other end of the wire, for she asked if anything was the matter. In reply I asked her if Miss Quigley had left any manuscripts or parts of manuscripts with her. The reply was that before leaving the authoress she had except a detective story in the hands of her publishers. I groaned again and hung up the receiver without even thanking the person for her information.

There was nothing for it but to read the story and write the last chapter myself. Just think—make an ending to a detective story, a detective story written by a woman famed for weaving plots that no human being but herself could unravel! I must first wade through a labyrinth of incidents intended to throw the reader off the track, my head at the same time being full of other matters. Connolly attended to such work, and I knew little or nothing about it. He had gone into hiding to escape a legal summons and no one but himself knew where. With the authoress in the middle of the biggest ocean on earth, there was no respite for me. I took up the telephone receiver again.

"Send me the manuscript of that detective story at once. There's been some confounded carelessness somewhere, and whoever is to blame will get his head taken off!"

The latter part of this message was superfluous. It was merely a blowing off of the mad that was in me. The manuscript came down, and, placing it on the desk at one side, the rest being covered with an infinite variety of matter, principally glibly proofs, page proofs and everything else that can come from printers to distress an editor. I turned to the first chapter and began to skim, for I had altogether too much to occupy me to give the matter undivided attention. While reading the first chapter I gave orders concerning the making of pictures, the buying of supplies, the turning down of submitted manuscripts. I apologized for having offended suffragists, anti-suffragists, prohibitionists and whitebaiters.

I have given this information respecting the interruptions attending my reading of the first chapter simply for a sample of the rest. When I finished all of the story I possessed I knew no more about the plan on which it was written than of the last chapter. But I had formed some idea of what might possibly be thrown in to worry the reader—it certainly worried me—and I went over it all again, this time to get a comprehensive view, and the result was more satisfactory. But as to who stole the watermelon—it was either a watermelon or a saprophyte as big as a watermelon—I had not the faintest conception. However, since there must be a conclusion I selected from a number of intended misleaders one that I thought would be the easiest to make fit the conditions. This done, I looked my desk and went home to dinner.

At 10 o'clock I sat down to write the last chapter of "The Gem of Good Hope." My work consisted in fitting my denouement to the rest of the story or, rather, in fitting the rest of the story to my denouement. Whoever has tried to work out one of those puzzles in which there is always one piece which cannot be made to fit in its proper place will understand the nerve-racking task in which I was engaged. Just as I had come to believe that I was meeting with some success I smelled smoke and heard a commotion below.

Running downstairs, I found an incipient fire in the kitchen back of the range and set about putting it out. Some one had turned in an alarm, and in a few minutes the changing fire engines were pulling up before the door. The house was filled with brown, small boys, women and smoke. Fortunately the fire was not serious and returned to its original state.

crowd attracted by the noisy firemen.

It was 2 o'clock in the morning before I finished writing the last chapter of "The Gem of Good Hope" and, throwing myself into bed, tried to sleep. But I was tortured by a fear that I had left something unconnected that would make the story ridiculous. However, I managed to get four hours' slumber and, after a hasty breakfast, went to the office with the manuscript.

After the typographical errors had been eliminated the proofs came to me for revision. They were a sight to behold. The proofreader had put one or more query marks in every paragraph, the sheets looking as if insects emerging from an inkwell had mandered over the paper. Most of these errors arose from fixing the body of the story to accord with my denouement. I might have turned them into good English, but every query mark let loose a million discrepancies. However, I did the best I could with them in the limited time and attention I was able to give them and passed the revised sheets on till the last chapter was reached, which I was pleased to see read very smoothly even if it deleted every intention of the author.

I wished that the book could be issued at once instead of in a couple of months. If the story came out immediately its glaring incongruities might be forgotten before the return of the authoress. I knew very well that she would make it hot for me, and if she returned when the story was issued it was quite likely there would be a veritable Popet. If she returned later and my vision of her story was found not to be so bad as might have been expected she might let me down with comparative ease.

A perusal of the page proofs took away all hope. My ending of the story was not at all borne out by the circumstances. Every one of forty-nine of the fifty chapters bristled with reasons why my denouement could not have been possible. I, the author, the firm, would be ruined. Nevertheless the issue must go as it was. The story had been advertised for issue on a certain date and must be in the hands of the dealers at that time.

When I took up the first criticism on the story I trembled. It happened to be one of those that to us who know meant that the writer had not time to read the book. It spoke of Miss Quigley's marvelous ingenuity, etc. I groaned. Marvelous ingenuity! Just wait till some fifteen dollar a week newspaperman has read the book attentively.

The next criticism I read was more definite. It spoke of the story as the most subtle of all Miss Quigley's wonderful plans. The critic was reminded of the stories of eminent detective story writers who left purposely a shadow of doubt in the reader's mind just what was intended. The story of "The Lady and the Tiger," the denouement of which was left to the reader, was cited as a most successful effort in this line of work.

An idea popped into my brain. Turning to my stenographer, I dictated the following item, which I sent to a trade paper devoted to book news:

The "Gem of Good Hope," by Alice Quigley, is a new departure in detective story writing. After ably leading the reader through a number of incidents, each calculated to suggest a theory, the writer with consummate skill brings the story to an end upon a theory not at all in harmony with the facts laid down, leaving the reader to form any theory that he can fit to the narrative.

Having secured the publication of this item in one paper, I took measures to have it copied by others. It was not long before many of those who read the book had heard that it was intended for a puzzle to be worked out by the reader. The consequence was that every reader perused the pages with the utmost attention in order that he might be the better able to form the correct theory.

As soon as this view of the case was spread abroad the sales of "The Gem of Good Hope" rapidly increased. I seriously considered offering a prize for the person who should give the correct interpretation to the story. I would surely have done so, but since it would be impossible to name anything that would conform to the facts as laid down I did not see how any one could win the prize. This, of course, would reflect on the integrity of the publishers.

Fortunately before Miss Quigley returned from her trip her book had had an enormous sale. I saw a notice in a newspaper of her arrival and fortified myself with a number of checks with which to make a defense when she visited me. She came in with eyes aching and so choked with emotions for me that she could not utter a word. I took advantage of the delay to hand her a $5,000 check. She took it without looking at it and, having found her voice, fired a volley. To this I replied with a $10,000 check. "This check she glanced at, and it produced an effect. She was beginning again when I fired a big gun at her loaded with $15,000 shrapnel. This staggered her, and she looked at all the checks I had given her.

"What does this mean?" she asked.
"It means," I said, "that your last and greatest work has had a phenomenal sale. No such literary financial success has been attained in years. Sit down, Miss Quigley, and I will tell you how it came about."

And I did. I gave her the story much as I have told it here. When I had finished it required some time for her to satisfy herself that she had not with a piece of good fortune instead of the barbarous treatment she had supposed.

Her next story she drew with the intention of leaving the reader to guess the outcome. It proved a failure.

Mother was too busy. "Everybody's sick at your house?" "Yed. Pa's got the grip. So has Aunt Mary, and sister Jane. I'm just getting over it." "And your mother? Has she the grip too?" "Gee whiz, no. Ma ain't got time to have it. She's got to wait on all the rest of 'em."

A busy man some time ago had occasion to visit a noted doctor, and was compelled for many weary minutes to sit in a stuffy anteroom. Finally, his patience becoming exhausted, he summoned an attendant, to whom he said: "Present my compliments to the doctor, and tell him if I am not admitted in five minutes I shall get well again." He was at once admitted.

A young wife, wishing to announce the birth of her first child to a friend in a distant city, sent the telegram, Isaiah IX, 6, beginning, "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given." Her friend, more literal and less familiar with the scriptures, read the message and said to her husband: "Margaret evidently has a boy; but why the on earth did they name him Isaiah? He must healthy, too, for he weighs nine pounds and six ounces."

"Everybody in our family is some kind of an animal," remarked Tommy. "What do you mean?" remarked his mother. "Why, mother, you're a dear you know." "Yes, Tommy, and the baby is mother's little lamb." "I'm the kid; sister is some chicken; Aunt Mary is a cat and Cousin Kate is a bird; and Uncle Jim is a ass; and little brother's a pig. Dad's the goat; and—" "That is enough, Thomas."

Noble--Compton.

James A. Noble and Miss Lillian Compton, both well-known residents of this city, were quietly married last week Wednesday evening by the Rev. L. H. Manning at his residence in Petoskey. They left the following morning for Grand Rapids, where they will spend the honeymoon, and on their return will probably make Charlevoix their home.

Both the bride and groom have a large number of close friends in this city who extend them hearty congratulations.

HOW TO KEEP MOSQUITOES AWAY.

To keep mosquitoes away from one while asleep it is recommended that the following solution be prepared and a few drops put on the pillow and on a towel near the head of the bed:

Oil of citronella..... 1 oz.
Spirits of camphor..... 1 oz.
Oil of cedar..... 1 1/2 oz.
Another preparation for the same purpose is:
Oil of lavender..... 1 oz.
Alcohol..... 1 oz.
Castor oil..... 1 oz.

This is not as unpleasant as the other mixture, and a few drops can be sprinkled on the face and hands and on a towel hung at the end of the bed.
Orange peel burned in the room is also an efficacious mosquito killer. For mosquito bites plain soap applied to the bitten places is effective. Other remedies are ammonia, alcohol, glycerin, bicarbonate of soda, sugar, calcium chloride.

TEST FOODS.

Many Household Staples Found to Be Adulterated.

Housewives ought to have a bit of many kinds of knowledge. The perfect housewife must not only have a thorough knowledge of the outside, but she must also be an excellent business woman and know how to apply business methods to her home. She must have a practical acquaintance with chemistry and biology and must have the art of making a house into a home.

Just at present the women in the home need another kind of knowledge which will prove invaluable to them at many a time. That is how to know if their food is adulterated. There are, unfortunately, frauds in every line of work, and the food frauds always seize upon such occasions as the present, when the authorities are busy elsewhere, to perpetrate the worst crimes against the community. Probably foodstuffs all over will be adulterated and the wise housewife will learn how to detect the presence of foreign elements in the provisions she buys.

Butter is one of the first to suffer. Margarine has often been used as a substitute in the past and probably will be passed off many times in the future. While margarine is perfectly wholesome, still no woman wants to pay the price of butter for the less costly margarine. A reliable test is, melt a little bit in a spoon over a gas burner. Good butter froths a great deal, but makes very little noise. Margarine, on the contrary, crackles and bursts and makes little explosive sounds. After applying this test you can refuse to buy again at the same shop if you detect the presence of margarine in the substance which you bought as butter.

The easiest and commonest food to adulterate is milk. Watered milk is almost as common as plain water, but it is so easy to discover the fraud that no housewife need be taken in by it. Pour your milk into a pail or pot. Then take a fairly stout, very bright knitting needle and plunge it into the milk. If, on removal, a large drop of the fluid clings to the end of the needle for quite a time without falling off you may feel quite sure that the milk is all right. If, on the other hand, the liquid runs right off the steel needle and forms no lasting drop the milk has certainly been watered.

Mini Relishes.

Green Peas and Mint.—Shell green peas just before they are to be cooked. Line the top of a double boiler with green lettuce leaves, put the peas in, add a tablespoonful of chopped parsley, cover and cook until done, which will be about half an hour or perhaps forty minutes. Then drain, add a tablespoonful of finely minced mint, salt and pepper and two tablespoonfuls of butter.

Mint Sauce.—In taking your walks abroad at this season bring home with you if you can a handful of mint from the roadside. To make the sauce that goes so excellently well with spring lamb or game chop line the well washed leaves of a bunch of mint, then pour over them a cupful of boiling water and add two tablespoonfuls of sugar. Cover and let stand in a cool place for an hour to fuse; then add a quarter of a teaspoonful of salt, a dash of paprika and four tablespoonfuls of vinegar. Mix thoroughly and serve with the meat.

Mint Chutney.—Add to a handful of finely minced mint leaves a cupful of seeded raisins, two tablespoonfuls of sugar, one of tomato ketchup and a saltspoonful of salt. Mash and mix until juicy; then serve in a bowl with cold meats.

Mint Sherbet.—Take six lemons, two oranges, two cupfuls of sugar, two cupfuls of water, one large bunch of fresh mint, the white of one egg and a piece of green leaf the size of a pea. Squeeze the juice from the lemons and oranges. Pour cold water over the peelings and put on the stove, allowing it to come to a boil; then pour it over the sugar and mint, which has been cut up fine. Cover it and allow it to steep for an hour. Then strain over the juice of the lemons and oranges. Dissolve the green leaf in a little of the mixture until it is clear and then add to the juices. Mix the ingredients together with the white of an egg, well beaten and a dash of vinegar. Serve in sherbet glasses garnished with a tiny sprig of mint.

SEAMEN'S LAW IS DENOUNCED

Branded "Stupidest Piece of Legislation" in History.

DEMAND MADE FOR REPEAL

Henry D. Estabrook Flays Wilson-Lafollette Act Urging the Upbuilding of a Merchant Marine in Preference to the Proposed Government Owned Vessels—Strong Plea For Protective Tariff.

Detroit, Mich., Jan. 20.—Henry D. Estabrook of New York, who was the principal speaker at the annual meeting of the Lake Carriers' Association at the Statler Hotel here tonight, denounced the Wilson-Lafollette Seamen's Act as the stupidest piece of legislation in the history of the country and demanded its repeal. Mr. Estabrook also urged the upbuilding of a merchant marine and assailed the proposition that the government own merchant vessels.

"Time was," said Mr. Estabrook "when the American flag covered the seven seas, and the ocean highways which are always paved and custodial for repairs, were as much ours as England's. Now the ship that flies our flag is a lonesome spectacle—an object of derision—and such few ships as we have the Wilson-Lafollette Act will soon put out of commission."

Presidential Candidates.

Unusual interest attached to the address by Mr. Estabrook inasmuch as he is being prominently mentioned as a candidate for the Republican nomination for president of the United States. His candidacy is being urged in response to a widespread demand for new leadership in the G. O. P. Political developments of the last few weeks all point to the nomination by the Republicans next June at Chicago of a compromise candidate—one who can make a real "Get-Together" appeal to all elements of the party.

HENRY D. ESTABROOK.

Mr. Estabrook occupies a strategic position politically, as is pointed out, for the reason that he is a Western man, although his home is now in New York. He came from Nebraska originally and spent several years in Chicago before removing to New York, where he attained prominence in the practice of law during the last decade. He has been prominently before the public for twenty years, although not as an office seeker and has never been in any way involved in the factional dissensions and quarrels that have proved so disastrous to the Republicans since 1912. His friends argue that any man who voted either for Taft or for Roosevelt four years ago would support Estabrook loyally and enthusiastically, whereas to nominate a candidate who was actively identified with the Taft forces on the one hand or the Roosevelt people on the other would be to invite a repetition of the debacle of 1912.

A Great Campaigner.

Estabrook is one of the greatest campaigners the country has produced. He has made a number of notable addresses in this state, and his speeches in Michigan in support of McKinley in 1900 are still remembered and quoted.

In his address tonight Mr. Estabrook also touched upon the tariff problem and anti-business legislation and administration. He is a protectionist on the McKinley school and makes a particularly strong appeal to the American farmer and laborer on this subject.

"The American farmer should not be compelled to sell his products in a free trade market and buy in a protected market, and yet that is just what such legislation as Canadian Reciprocity and the present Democratic Tariff Law compel him to do," said Mr. Estabrook, and again: "From whatever angle you approach it, the question works out to the same result; free trade in this country benefits the rich and robs the laborer, and the laborer ought to know it by this time. I do not believe that our normal prosperity will ever be restored until our tariffs are restored or more scientifically graduated."

Mr. Estabrook is being urged by many influential Michigan Republicans to enter the presidential primary in this state. Without doubt he would make a strong bid for the Michigan delegation.

WON FIRST HOME GAME

Ellsworth Basketball Team Defeats C. H. S. by Score 31 to 21.

Saturday night the Ellsworth basketball team beat the fast Charlevoix high school quintet in their first home game of the season and when the whistle sounded the home team was on the long end of a 31 to 21 score. The game was replete with roughness and much fouling, but altogether an interesting one for the spectators, who filled all the available room in the hall.

Now the boys have got started, come out and help them win games.

Central Lake will be played on the home floor Friday night of this week. Everybody come.

Correspondence

Wildwood

Look as if spring had come.

The Clarence Fales family are all much improved this week.

Emery Wilson is better of the gripe and has returned to school at Central Lake.

Misses Gladys and Effie Larsen visited with Jane Crawford Sunday afternoon.

Jim Wilson was in Central Lake Saturday and in Ellsworth Monday on business each day.

The whole household at the Stevens home are sick with the gripe. Baby Genevieve especially is real sick.

Mr. and Mrs. Tom Emery and their little son, Charles, of Ellsworth spent Sunday with the former's mother here.

Grant Klnner has his wood job completed on E. R. Wilson's place and all hauled away, just in time before the thaw.

Friends of Mrs. Ellis who are interested will be glad to hear of her safe arrival at her home in Saskatchewan, N. W. Canada.

The high wind Saturday blew the Wildwood mail box and tree it was fastened to down. Until it is reposted, Mr. Patterson delivers our mail by hand.

A. M. Chusbrough is visiting his mother, Mrs. Almond Miller, and on Friday he went to Central Lake and had his teeth drawn. Makes him look like a very old man.

We think Route 1 from Ellsworth has a carrier that takes the cake—ice cream, too, for that matter. Whether his horse needs stilts, sharp shoes, or gum boots he is always here, almost on time. Better meet him with a smile all the while as if he does make a mistake once in a while. Didn't you ever make one?

Pleasant Hill

Oscar Larson is again on the sick list. The contest in deportment ends Friday.

The sixth graders are struggling in fractions.

Director, Harschel Aales visited the school a very short time on Thursday.

The fifth grade have finished the study of Europe and are now reviewing it.

The Misses Effia and Gladys Larsen were Sunday visitors at the Crawford's home.

The victims of la grippe are gradually returning to school, eighteen being present now.

Miles District

Mr. Cook has butchered a hog and a calf.

Mrs. Sherman was in Ellsworth Saturday.

Alberta LaClair and Mrs. Miles visited at Moblos' last Sunday.

Laurance Isman drove a herd of cattle to Charlevoix last Saturday.

Nearly all are back to school after having a taste of the gripe.

Ike Ovanter speared two fish Saturday. Both were nice ones.

The Sherman family spent a very pleasant day with James Boyd last Sunday.

Mrs. Jas. Hudson has her carpet loom now in operation and is ready to do carpet weaving at low charges. She is located about a mile and a half north-east of the Miles school.

The county examinations that were sent out by Miss Stewart were given last week. All those who took it seemed to think it a very fair examination and their marks show it to be the same.

The first fire of the season spread its disastrous flames over the little cottage of Laurance Cincush. Mr. Cincush was not having very good success in his bungalow and stepped into his neighbor's (Lynn Evans) fish shanty. While chatting over the various items of news they were aroused by the horrible cries of "Fire! fire!" from L. K. Clark, a resident along the lake. Help came too late and the little fish shanty pined sadly away into a heap of ashes. Mr. Cincush's loss amounted to a good deal, for among his other losses was a valuable overcoat, and it is reported that there was no insurance either on the little house or personal property.

Rock Elm District

Miss Greta Lacroix has been sick for a few days but hopes soon to be able to return to school.

Owing to sickness and icy roads the attendance at the Sunday afternoon services was small.

The ladies of this district met Monday afternoon at the grange hall to sew for a needy family.

Mrs. Grosset of East Jordan spent a few days last week helping to care for her daughter, Mrs. Charles Donaldson.

Mrs. Charles Donaldson, who has been quite sick for the past week, is now recovering and hopes soon to be about again.

Mrs. Levi Metz and daughter, Sadie, who have been on the sick list, are now much improved, and Miss Sadie hopes to return to school this week.

NEAT FOOTWEAR.

The Fad Styles Should Be Avoided by Women.

Regarding footwear, one cannot lay too much stress on the fact that it is one of the most important features of feminine wardrobe this season. Nevertheless the woman of good taste will disregard the many fad stockings and shoes offered to her and will select quiet, elegant, delicate coverings that will distinguish her from the great mass who rush in where angels fear to tread.

It is perfectly good taste to wear the spots of white, of tan or pale gray with the morning or afternoon costume. With the latter, however, may be worn a low shoe of white, of gray or black kid—according to the costume—with trimmings of a contrasting color.

It is always better judgment to have the hosiery match the color of the dress or suit. This makes less awkward, in effect, the woman to whom the very short skirt is not becoming, and it makes less conspicuous the unsightly ankle which offends the eye of the esthete.

After several seasons of huckle ornamentation an era of simple lines and low decoration has set in. Very few buckles are seen even in connection with the dancing slipper. Bronze vamps with champagne uppers are among the novelties offered for wear with the dress costume. They combine the color scheme of the costume and thus counteract the grotesque line of the very short skirt.

Shoe treads have improved vastly within the last few seasons. To a very large extent the wooden forms have been supplanted by those of metal.

OBLIGATION OF SPRAYING.

Spraying with insecticide is the life insurance of plant life. If it is neglected there is not only loss to the owner of fruit and flowers, but danger to the neighbor. If state supervision is justified over all nurseries that plant diseases may not be disseminated there certainly is a moral obligation on every plant lover to keep his own stock free of insect pests or diseases that his neighbor may not suffer.

PASTURING ALFALFA.

It is an Acute Problem on Irrigated Farms in Certain Sections. It is one thing to secure a good stand of alfalfa on an irrigated farm, but it is quite another problem to maintain a good stand of this legume when it is being continually pastured down. In numerous sections of the southwest, where the season is long and animals

A Covered Fountain.
Clean water should be provided for the poultry at all times. In order to keep the fowls from getting into the drinking pan it is necessary to make some sort of a covering. A frame built of slats attached to a small round board at the top and a larger round board placed about a foot above the water pan makes a splendid device. When placed over the pan the chickens have free access to the water through the slats, and the water keeps much cooler by being shaded. The frame may easily be lifted off and the water pan cleaned and refilled. If this arrangement is used the chickens cannot tip the water over.

FIGURED ON A WALKAWAY

But Harbor Springs Kept Local Independents on Their Mettle

Charlevoix High loses to Ellsworth Fast—Mancelona Team to Play Here Thursday Night.

A basket ball game that looked like a real walk away for the local aggregation for the first few minutes of play developed into a nip and tuck contest before the final period was completed when Harbor Springs, led by St. Powers, invaded the city last Thursday in the first scheduled encounter of the winter season. While expecting defeat, the Harbor men stated that they made a better showing than they really were looking for, and gave the local quintet a close and fast run for the final verdict. The score board showed a 40-22 count at the end of the frag.

Charlevoix opened the contest in regular fashion and secured eight points before the visitors tallied a single one. With this substantial lead it was plain that the local men were satisfied as to the outcome and began making a few changes in the line in order to give all the applicants a chance. D'Ooge, of Ypsilanti fame, was shoved in at center to fill Hamilton's place, who, by the way, in the first half showed the fans that he could play the game. D'Ooge will probably be out for regular work from now on and hopes to round into shape for the Mancelona game this week. There may be some other alterations in the line up for Thursday night.

Dane Rumour has it that Mancelona folks are coming up to our quiet and undisturbed little hamlet for real red gore on the evening of the 27th, which to be exact, is this coming Thursday. It is with all due respect to our opponents that we listen to their ravings, but it is a cinch that it is going to take more than hot air to win. If there is to be blood shed, let it flow freely, and just remember that Mancelona gore might, we say might, for we are no prophets up this neck of the woods, be just as crimson as local fluid.

Every one should turn out in force Thursday night. The weather indications are that it will be warm and cozy in the rink and enough excitement on the floor to make it attractive.

Charlevoix High went down to defeat by the Ellsworth five last Saturday night to the tune of 32-24, by official count. The Ellsworth team play in cramped quarters, which was a trifle awkward for the Charlevoix men, although they put a fast and scrappy game. The first half ended with Charlevoix leading with 13 points to Ellsworth's, but during the wind-up of the game Ellsworth sneaked a few baskets over on us and came out the victor. Miles and Fowler of East Jordan High School were in the line-up for Ellsworth.

Current events are studied every week by the pupils of our school.

We take turns in filling our drinking fountain. Ray Bowen fills it this week.

We are much interested in the new system of writing, the Palmer method.

Our attendance has been very irregular since the holiday vacation on account of la grippe and stormy weather.

The mid-year tests given by Miss M. Stewart will be written on this week because of so many being absent last week.

We look forward to getting each number of our school papers, viz.: "The American Boy," "Youth's Companion" and "Current Events."

Sarah Boyer, who attended our school until Christmas and then moved to Boyne City, is reported to have lost the use of her hands and arms by a paralytic stroke.

WANTS SECOND TERM

State Senator J. Lee Morford Announces That He Will Be a Candidate.

It is hinted that State Senator J. Lee Morford of the 29th senatorial district will be a candidate for a second term from this district. While the senator has not made a formal announcement, it is generally known among his friends and supporters that he desires a second term and will soon formally announce himself as a candidate.

He will undoubtedly conduct his campaign on his record as a member of the lower house for two terms and one term in the senate.

FIRE DESTROYS BUILDING

Feltz Dry Cleaning Establishment at Petoskey Wiped Out by Flames.

Fire discovered shortly after 2 o'clock last Wednesday night destroyed the Feltz dry cleaning establishment at Petoskey, causing a total loss of the building and contents.

The building was an old wooden structure and was gutted from one end to the other. The fixtures, also the furniture and clothing of Mr. and Mrs. Feltz and child, who occupied the second floor, were destroyed and considerable damage was done to adjoining buildings.

The cause of the fire is unknown.

Writing Beet Contracts.

Farmers desiring to renew their beet contracts or obtain new ones are requested to see J. R. Cooper at once. Mr. Cooper is now writing all sugar beet contracts for 1916, also fertilizer contracts. Get in as early as possible with contracts for both articles.—J. R. Cooper. Adv. 41f.

ADDITIONAL LOCALS

The Maccabees will have installation and supper Friday night of this week. Every member is requested to be present.

It is reported that James Raby, who lives in South Charlevoix and who some three weeks ago left this city for a visit to points in Canada, has enlisted with the Canadian troops and will soon be sent to the trenches. Raby, it is said, is a former member of the Canadian Guards and owing to this fact was forced to re-enlist.

Fine Window Display

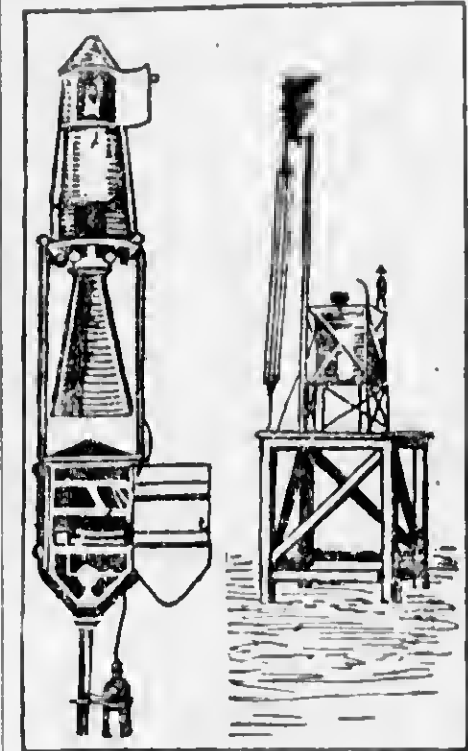

Babcock & Son, Floriata, have one of the best window displays of plants, cut flowers and set pieces in the window of Myrtle Young & Son we have seen for some time. Beautiful winter blooming plants, fine geraniums, etc., besides a number of artistically arranged set pieces fill the window, showing that these gentlemen have flowers in large quantities and also the skill to arrange them in a most becoming manner. Look at the window. It will be time well spent.

WIRELESS FOG GUN.

Automatic Device For Warning Shipping In Thick Weather.

A system of wireless control that is now being applied successfully at several points in Scotland seems to have solved the problem of distant control of acetylene fog guns located at points difficult of access and provides a means by which a number of such installations may be operated from one wireless station without the necessity for visiting the different signals except for making repairs and replenishing the supply of gas, says Popular Mechanics.

When started it automatically feeds and fires itself at regular intervals until the supply of acetylene runs out, and the wireless control simply provides a means of starting it when there is a fog and stopping it when the fog clears without going near the signal. Furthermore, the wireless apparatus is so arranged and timed that it is not interfered with by the more powerful waves that may be sent out by passing ships or by other wireless stations. The control waves are sent out by an ordinary wireless station of rather low power, while the waves are received at the fog gun by four short aerials. The electric impulses then pass through a special form of coherer to a relay which is very sensitive, but has a large movement, and is therefore capable of keeping in adjustment under all temperature conditions. From the relay the impulses pass alternately to two synchronizers, each of which is connected with one of two electro magnets that control a needle valve in the outlet of the acetylene tank. When one of these magnets is energized it opens the needle valve and causes the gun to begin and continue feeding and firing itself automatically, and when the other magnet is energized the valve is closed and locked, shutting off the supply of acetylene and therefore stopping the operation of the gun.

Coal Waste Utilized.

The mountains of culm or coal waste which break the sky line throughout the anthracite coal region of Pennsylvania and which were for many years considered a nuisance are now being made to serve a very useful purpose. There is at present a market for almost any grade of anthracite that will burn, and no more coal goes to the culm bank except for temporary storage and subsequent recovery by washers. These ranges of artificial hills unsightly monuments to former waste are contributing their share to the total coal production and are rapidly disappearing. Even the waste from the culm bank washers is being utilized for it is flushed into the mines and partly fills old workings, where it cements together and furnishes support to the roof when the coal previously left for pillars is removed.

Uses of Quicksilver.

Quicksilver is used mainly for the manufacture of fulminate for explosive caps, electric appliances, dyes, and scientific apparatus and for the recovery of gold and silver by amalgamation. The use in gold and silver recovery was formerly extensive, but the rapid increase in the cyanidation of gold and silver ores has materially decreased the recovery by amalgamation. This is, of course, due in part to the change in depth from free milling to oxidized ores, but more largely to the successful treatment of certain large supplies of ores never profitable by amalgamation at any depth and to increased economies and profits by the substitution of cyanidation for amalgamation.

Sweating Aluminum to Other Metals.—Aluminum may be sweated to other metals by the following method: First coat the aluminum surface to be soldered with a layer of zinc. On top of the zinc is melted a layer of an alloy of one part aluminum to 2.5 parts of zinc. The surfaces are placed together and heated until the alloy between is liquefied.

SAVE 60C PER GALLON ON PAINT

We are starting to move into the New Hardware Store Building and the next stock we wish to move is PAINT.

Paint has advanced in price from 15c to 25c per gallon since last fall. The price then was $2.10 per gallon and the Spring price will be at least $2.35 per gallon.

We are changing our PAINT LINE from PENINSULAR to B. P. S., not because Peninsular was not good paint but because we think B. P. S. is better for us to handle on account of its popularity with some of our good customers, and being known as one of the best paints made.

Our line is broken so far as a full line of colors is concerned, but if the shades we have left appeal to you, take it home at, per gallon $1.75

Up to and including February 10th

when the SPRING PRICE will prevail. Every drop guaranteed by us the same as if you paid the full price. The above applies to OUTSIDE HOUSE PAINT, but we will also sell all of our old stock of paint at prices in same proportion.

This is a saving of 60 cents per gallon and should appeal to anyone who is figuring on painting in the Spring.

WE INCREASED OUR BUSINESS 100 PER CENT Last Year

Why did we do this? Because we gave our customers prompt and honest treatment. We intend to repeat this during the coming year and will greatly appreciate your co-operation. We will give you the same treatment as last year—sell honest goods at honest prices—and the result will be the same, not only to you but to us.

We will try to attain the same result this year as last—it will mean a greater effort on our part, but under the methods we do business, it can be done. The first fifteen days of the present year has proved that, with your help we can do it. We want your business and will make an effort to get it. When you are in need of goods in our line, call at our store, get our prices, and the result will be that you buy here. Your business will be appreciated and we will save you dollars every time you buy a bill of goods of us. Try it and see if this statement is not true.

Fresh vs. Rotted Stable Manure.

Query—What is the value of manure per ton? Can the most good be gotten from manure applied to the land fresh from the stable or after it has rotted in a pile or manure pit?

Answer—One ton of average manure contains 10 pounds of nitrogen, 2.2 pounds of phosphorus and 8.3 pounds of potash. This, by the way, is a poorly balanced mixture of plant food and could be improved by the addition of rock phosphate. If one were to buy the plant food represented by the above figures in the form of inorganic fertilizer materials it would cost, at the former price of these elements, about $2.50. Neglecting losses and taking into account the value of stable manure in supplying the soil with humus, a ton of average stable manure would be worth even more than this. Van Slyke gives the following approximate value for the plant food in one ton of average manure: Pig, $2.00; cow, $2.20; steer, $2.35; horse, $2.50; sheep, $3.20; hen, $1.40.

With these figures as a basis for comparison it is interesting to note the value of the manure produced by each class of animals in one year. The figures for the amounts produced are also from Van Slyke:

Animal	Weight	Amount of manure	Value
Horse	1000 lbs.	9 tons	$22.50
Cow	1000 "	13.5 "	29.70
Pig	200 "	3 "	6.00
Sheep	150 "	1 "	3.20

It is pretty generally agreed now that manure taken from the stable directly to the field and spread at once, not left in piles, loses less plant food than when handled in any other way. There are, of course, arguments for and against this system. Although it takes two tons of fresh manure to make one of rotted manure, yet, in trials extending over a period of 15 years with wheat, oats, barley and mangels, a ton of rotted manure produced practically the same yields as the same weight of fresh manure. While there is less likelihood of the nitrogen being lost from fresh manure scattered on the land, in rotted manure the other elements are in a more available condition. Fresh manure decomposes more rapidly in the soil and helps to set free some inorganic plant food from the soil itself, but weed seeds are often introduced through fresh manure. The physical condition of heavy soils is more improved by fresh manure, but rotted manure is better for light, sandy soils. In furnishing more bacteria fresh manure is better to apply with green manure crops. With these facts in mind, manure, whether fresh or rotted, ought to be handled to better advantage.

PRICE $1.50 PER YEAR

SHOULD TEST ALL SEED CORN

Considered An Absolute Necessity This Year By Experts.

But Small Amount of Northern Michigan Corn Suitable to Be Used for Seed.

Testing seed corn for germination—always a profitable farm practice—is an absolute necessity this year in many sections. In a number of districts the last corn crop from which seed for the coming planting will be taken was late in maturing or so moist when harvested as to call for special precautions. A high moisture content makes seed corn particularly susceptible to damage from freezing or heating. Farmers in the sections where corn failed to ripen normally who do not test their seed early enough to be able to replace their own bad seed with good seed secured from other sources will be taking an unnecessary risk. It is also especially important for holders of seeds in such districts to take unusual care during the remainder of the winter to protect it from freezing.

While complete testing for germination should take place shortly before the seed is planted, the specialists of the department believe that it will be simple forehandness for farmers who have any reason to be doubtful about the vitality of their seed to make a preliminary germinating test with a few typical ears taken at random from the rack. If these preliminary tests show that the seed is good the owner then can continue his precautions to guard it from weather damage. If, however, this test with a few ears indicate that the seed is of low vitality the farmer should at once make further tests to satisfy himself as to whether his seed corn generally is good or bad.

If a farmer finds his seed is bad he should take steps at once to meet the difficulty. The purchase of seed should not be delayed till spring, especially when so much corn in various sections has been damaged. The farmer should secure his seed from well-known sources, buy it upon a germinating guaranty basis, and get his seed or typical samples early enough to make his own germinating tests. It is probable this year that many farmers who have not followed the wise practice of selecting enough special seed from good crops to last them in an emergency for two or three years will have to buy seed. In buying seed farmers should try to secure corn of varieties known to prosper in their section. The safest seed would be that carefully selected from good corn grown in the immediate neighborhood, but at any rate an effort should be made to obtain seed grown in districts where climate, soil and farming conditions in general are similar to those at home.

If the farmer happens to have a stock of seed left over from the 1914 crop and doubts the seed saved from his 1915 crop he would do well to test the older seed also and then use whichever shows the greater vitality. Seed corn if properly cared for will retain its vitality for several years. Many farmers, knowing this, always select an extra amount of seed from an unusually good harvest.

The following method of testing seed corn is taken from Farmers' Bulletin 704:

The corn is placed on drying racks made by driving wire finishing nails about four inches apart on four sides of a stick. A number is placed over the nail and the butts of the ears are put on the nails. If wire fencing or other seed racks are used the ears can be numbered in other ways.

In single ear testing, two kernels from opposite sides of the ear on the top, two from the middle and two from the butt are put in numbered squares or portions of germinating boxes or other testers. The kernels are kept moist at a room temperature not above 90 degrees F. nor below 50 degrees F. After six or seven days the seed should begin to sprout. Only those ears from which all kernels give strong sprouts should be reserved for planting.

Under ordinary circumstances it may not be absolutely necessary to test every individual ear. If a large number of typical ears show germinating tests as high as 97 per cent. the seed in general may be considered good. Under the unusual conditions prevailing this year—especially in neighborhoods where the corn did not mature normally—it should well repay a corn grower to test every ear that he intends to use for seed. If he has any reason to doubt the quality of his individual stock the ear-by-ear testing is simply a form of labor and crop insurance.

Before testing germination the farmer should examine each ear and throw out all the ears which do not look right or which have several withered or damaged kernels. He should strive to make up his seed from ears which in size and appearance seem to be normal for his variety of corn. Seed corn should be shelled if possible by hand to avoid the risk of damage by mechanical shelling. Before shelling the owner should pick out peculiar looking kernels and separate the seed into sizes so as to make certain that the corn drill will plant regularly.

THREE BELLS A STANDARD SCHOOL

Patrons of District Unite in Celebration of Occasion.

School Now a Modern One in Every Respect—Fine Program Rendered.

On Monday, January 31, Evelyn No. 2 received a well-earned Standard plate. A large crowd had gathered for the occasion, and the district mothers prepared a potluck dinner at the schoolhouse. The teacher, Mr. Peaslee, had arranged a splendid and appropriate program. One always likes to hear the boys and girls, and this time they meant what they said. The director, Frank Wangeman, represented his fellow members of the board in delivering a short but able address. The title of Mr. Peaslee's recitation was "They Said We Couldn't, But We Did." This was especially appropriate because the Three Bells district has the smallest valuation of Evelyn township, but was determined to have the best school building. They believe that when it is for their children it pays to dig down, and that is what they have done.

At the left and north of their schoolroom they added enough windows to make a solid wall of light. This brought the percentage up to 19 per cent. of the floor area, and compared to some of our country schoolrooms, sends a flood of light over every desk. They did not remove the windows at the right because they wished to have the benefit at times of the southern sunlight to purify the air in the room. Instead, they placed over them light-colored window shades and keep them drawn all of the time to prevent crosslights.

DEBTORS BUSY BECAUSE OF LAW

Garnishee Measure on Married Men Makes it Possible to Collect

New Law Leaves But Sixty Per Cent. Exempt—Young Men Must Come Across.

The Charlevoix man who owes everybody in general had better pay all the debts he can these days, following the going into effect of the new garnishee law, a portion of the judiciary act which makes his income liable for much larger assessments to apply on his indebtedness and gives the creditor a much greater lever to wield in forcing collections from the unwilling debtor.

Under the old law a married man who owed a multitude of debts and was not troubled by an over-abundant income, could sit back and take life easy, knowing that eighty per cent of his wages was exempt. The new law, however, took the joy out of his life. Something always does!

For it doubled the amount liable to garnishment, leaving the married man but sixty per cent. exempt, although he still has the same minimum safe from garnishment as before, eight dollars.

In the case of the single man the new law is no more lenient. Where he previously had forty per cent. of his income exempt, he now has but thirty. The minimum safe from garnishment proceeding, however, remains the same, four dollars.

In both the cases of the married and unmarried man, however, the percentage exempt applies as before, only up to the sum of thirty dollars, all above that amount of wages being liable.

To avoid the added costs of garnishment proceedings which can frequently be brought successfully now where they were abandoned before, the debtors generally are making strenuous efforts to square themselves with the forts, and many local collectors report most excellent success in their endeavors to have old debts settled, without the incident expense and trouble of garnishment a debtor's pay.

The old garnishment law, which is much changed by the new judiciary act, was passed several years ago and was at the time of its being put through the state legislature considered only a step in the right direction by collectors and creditors in all parts of Michigan.

They are most enthusiastic, however, in the changes just going into effect and see as a result the settlement of a large number of accounts that before had been looked upon as practically hopeless.

DIED AT ASHEVILLE

Announcement of Death of Helen Mary Meech Cause of Profound Sorrow.

Helen Mary Meech, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Meech, formerly of East Jordan, but now located at Asheville, North Carolina, died at Asheville on Sunday last of consumption.

The deceased was the eldest daughter and a graduate of the C. H. S. class of 1914. Shortly after symptoms of the dreaded white plague were evident she was taken to Asheville for treatment. She had been there since about September, but to no avail. But a few weeks ago her parents moved there from East Jordan to make their home.

The telegram announcing her demise received here Sunday by relatives stated that the bereaved mother was confined to her bed by illness, and that the remains would reach Charlevoix on the afternoon train to-day (Wednesday). Masonic pall-bearers will take charge of the remains when they reach here. Interment in Brookside cemetery.

The news of the death of the deceased was received here with profound sorrow, and the bereaved family has the deepest sympathy of the entire community.

CO. INSTITUTE THIS WEEK

Open Session To Be Held at Ironton Friday and Saturday.

One-Day Institutes During the Following Week—Programs of Great Interest Prepared.

Friday and Saturday of this week will be busy and profitable days for the farmers of Charlevoix county who attend the two days session of the County Farmers' Institute Society held at Ironton the last two days of the week.

Arrangements have been completed for the most successful meeting so far held in the county and everything is in readiness for the opening day. Topics that are of vital interest to the farmer, stockman and fruit raiser will be discussed by men who have made a study of each of the subjects.

The session of Women's Congress will be held at the Gleaner Hall, Ironton, Friday afternoon. A demonstration in vegetable cookery by Mrs. S. H. Noecker of Cassopolis will be a feature of the meeting.

Following are some of the topics that will be discussed at various places:

1. Some Studies of the Soil.
2. Legumes for Soil Builders.
3. Forage and Pasture Crops.
4. Corn and Silos for Northern Michigan.
5. Starting the New Farm.
6. Stock Growing, Feeding and Marketing.
7. The Farm Problem and Its Solution (Evening).
8. The Making of a Citizen (Evening).

Places of One-Day Institutes.

Place	February Topics
Marion Center Grange	7 2, 6, 7
Hall	1, 6, 7
Maple Grove Grange Hall	9 1, 6, 8
Pine Lake Grange Hall	9 1, 6, 8
Deer Lake Grange Hall	10 3, 4, 7
Clarion	11 2, 6, 7

The state speaker will handle only one topic at each session. Discussion of each topic will be led by a local speaker. Music and discussion of local topics by local speakers will round out the day's program at each place.

LOST TO ELLSWORTH

Eagle Patrol of Boy Scouts Defeated in One-Sided Game.

The Eagle Patrol of Boy Scouts went to Ellsworth last Saturday to play the Scout basketball team of that place. Owing to a misunderstanding, the Ellsworth boys were not all on the job, but filled in with some members of the Independent team to play the game. With this handicap, the Charlevoix scouts went down to defeat by a score of 36 to 18, one of the substitute Independent team players alone scoring 20 of the 36 points.

The game was an exciting one throughout, and had the Boy Scouts been playing the Ellsworth team without the Independent members, the score would at least have been reversed. The treatment accorded the Charlevoix boys was fine and a return game is looked for in the near future.

Patrol Leader Supernaw, Troop Scribe Widdfield and Scout Master Vinard accompanied the team on the trip. At the last troop meeting Harold Cartier was chosen to act as athletic director for the entire troop. The Ellsworth game was played by Cartier, Bedwin, Weed, Schweitzer and Krulik.

Michigan Live Stock Increase Shown Over '14

There are 680,000 horses in Michigan, says the department of agriculture, as compared to 673,000 one year ago. The value per head is $123, as compared with $132 one year ago. There are 876,000 milch cows, as compared to 814,000, with values placed at $56.20, as compared to $60.50 one year ago. The report shows a decrease in the number of sheep, with the price increased from $5 last year to $5.70 this year. There were 50,000 more swine, but the price was $1.00 per hundred lower than one ago.

County Has 397 Autos.

If the number of automobiles owned in a county is an evidence of the county's prosperity, Emmet is about the best in Northern Michigan. According to the secretary of state's report Emmet county has 511, Charlevoix 397, Cheyebogan 227, Antrim 276, Otsego 188, Oscoda has the least, 37.

That Brown Look on Print Papers Caused by War

Everybody who sees a newspaper in the United States—and that practically means the whole population—has noticed within the last week or so the peculiar color of the paper on which some of them are printed. Instead of being pure white or with a slight bluish tinge, many of the sheets are light brown.

An anxious inquirer says: "Why, this paper looks as though it had been scorched. Are those metal plate things they print from hot enough to do that?"

For the benefit of the inquirer and his many brothers we will enlighten them: It is on account of the war.

The light brown is the natural color of the wood pulp. As the paper manufacturers have run out, or are rapidly running out, of the blue needed for bleaching purposes they can no longer produce white paper. The blue is one of the many dyes that, before the war, were imported from Germany. None is coming in now and the stock on hand is about exhausted. Hence: Newspapers printed on brownish paper.

WHY NOT CHAR- LEVOIX COUNTY?

Nothing Is Too Good for the Community in Which We Live.

What a County Agricultural Agent Could Be Doing Right in Our Home County.

Below we produce an article clipped from Hoad's Dairyman, giving in part the work of a county agricultural agent. A few years ago a move was made to have a county agent in Charlevoix county, but on account of some reason or other it failed. In the meantime neighboring counties have been more successful in this matter and have their agents at work, with the best results. In every county where they have established agents, which number quite a few, the sentiment expressed is: "How did we get along in the past years without them?"

The matter is being taken up in our county, to get into line with other live wire counties and have a county agent. Information as to the work will be given through the columns of the Courier each week. Watch for it, as it will prove interesting reading. Below is the report of a Wisconsin agent:

"In his annual report to the County Board of Polk county, Wisconsin, County Agent John S. Klinkha draws attention to a part of his activities for the past year. He states that he has conducted two short courses in agriculture for boys and taught agriculture in the county training school for two half days each week for ten weeks. He vaccinated 95 animals against blackleg, tested 18 herds for tuberculosis, helped to establish milk testing in nine graded schools, assisted 17 farmers in spraying against potato blight, was in charge of five plots of demonstration work in growing grain, alfalfa and potatoes, and aided in surveying marshes. This work does not represent all that was done, but merely brings out some outstanding features. Educational work of several kinds was carried on and many farm visits were made."

Charlevoix Heeds Warning of "Watch Your Step"

Sudden Changes of Weather Turns the Streets Into Slippery Dance Floors—Rain for Many Days.

"Watch your step!" has been the slogan for Charlevoix the past week and the "Middle-of-the-Road" party the popular one with voters and suffragets.

Charlevoix's side-hill streets, washed sleek by a cheerless January rainfall, proved perilous thoroughfares. The tango masters would have turned green with envy could they have seen some of the improvisations in steps to meet the exigencies of the situation.

The down-hill glide and the up-grade wiggles constituted the most diverting of the acrobatic antics employed to get somewhere. The down-hill glide was simpler if one's runners were sharp, al-

WILL VOTE ON PROHIBITION

To Cost the Wets More Than One Hundred Million Dollars.

If Michigan Adopts Prohibition Measure in Coming November Election.

One hundred million dollars is the estimated value of saloons and brewery interests in Michigan that will be wiped out if the state-wide prohibition amendment to the constitution is carried at the general election, November 7.

Although the election is more than nine months distant, the campaign already is in full swing and indications are numerous that the coming battle will be as bitterly waged as any in the state's history.

At present there are in Michigan 3326 saloons, of which 1377 are in Detroit. Incidentally, although Detroit's population is only about 25 per cent. of the entire state, 40 per cent. of all the barrooms in Michigan are located in the metropolis. It is there that the dry leaders expect the stiffest opposition.

During the last eight years 2934 saloons in the state have been forced to suspend business under local option or by the operation of the Warner-Crampton law.

Figuring on the basis of the 1910 federal census, 41.9 per cent. of the entire population of Michigan is now in dry territory. By counties, 43 are dry and 40 wet; 58 of the incorporated cities of the state are dry, 50 are wet; of the incorporated villages 244 are in dry territory and 94 in wet territory; there are two dry cities in wet counties, with a combined population of 2200, and 24 dry villages in counties where the saloons are still legalized, with a total population of 19,588; the population of the 43 dry counties is 1,155,792, making the total dry population of the state 1,177,580, as compared with a total wet population of 1,632,592.

Michigan last voted on state-wide prohibition in April, 1887, when the question was submitted by the legislature as a constitutional amendment. Out of a total vote of 362,917, prohibition was then rejected by a majority of 5645. Since that time the dries have been unable to induce the legislature to submit the amendment to a vote. In 1913 an initiative and referendum were added to the Michigan constitution, and it is through means of the initiative that the prohibition question is being submitted this year. Under its terms ten per cent. of the electors must petition for the submission of any question, which means that the signers must number 42,238. Information at the dry headquarters is that considerably more than this number of signatures to the dry petition have already been obtained. The initiative petitions may be filed with the secretary of state any time before July 7, four months before the date of the election.

Foster Gets Five Years.

John E. Foster, former head of the United Retail Merchants Association, was found guilty in the United States court at Detroit last Thursday on an indictment charging fraudulent use of the mails. He was immediately sentenced to five years in the federal prison at Leavenworth, Kansas, and fined $18,000.

Through operations of the United Retail Association Foster swindled small town merchants in Michigan and Wisconsin out of $10,000. He was in Charlevoix last spring, but failed to find any merchants willing to take up his scheme.

Merchant Must Tell Public About His Bargains

An Unadvertised Marked-Down Sale Falls Flat—Best Offer Gets Patronage.

As the newspaper man looks over his exchanges at this time of year the strongest impression he gets is that of the enormous amount of advertising of midwinter sales.

From the big department store of some great city down to the little dry goods shop at some country crossroads "they're all doing it." It has become apparent to progressive merchants that it is cheaper to sell winter goods at a reduction now than to carry them over until another year, paying interest on money invested, insurance, taking chances of style changes or deterioration of the stock.

It has therefore become one of the fixed laws of trade that the public can get concessions in prices by buying at this time. But it is of very little use for a merchant to mark his prices down unless he tells the public about it.

An unadvertised mark-down sale falls flat. If a merchant does not make some announcement of the concessions he is willing to make, the public will conclude that he is not making any and that he prefers to carry his stock over to another season.

There is always a special class of trade waiting to take advantage of midwinter bargains. It consists of shrewd, economical people who would rather wear old goods a few weeks longer in order to get the low prices of February. Whenever they pick up a newspaper in midwinter they look first to see what merchants have "come across" with bargains. The best offer gets their patronage and they head direct for the store that makes it.

RECIPE FOR GRAY HAIR.

To half pint of water add 1 oz. Bay Rum, a small box of Harbo Compound, and 1/2 oz. of glycerine. Apply to the hair twice a week until it becomes the desired shade. Any druggist can put this up or you can mix it at home at very little cost. Full directions for making and use come in each box of Harbo Compound. It will gradually darken streaked, faded gray hair, and remove dandruff. It is excellent for falling hair and will make harsh hair soft and glossy. It will not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy, and does not rub off.

Stop the Grippe when It's Still a Cold

Grippe, Pneumonia, Bronchitis, all start from common colds. Head them off by using Foley's Honey and Tar Compound.

"A dose in time will save nine." A few doses of Foley's Honey and Tar Compound taken when you feel a cold coming on will save you a world of annoyance and possible distress.

Dry hacking coughs must never be neglected. They irritate the throat and chest. The use of Foley's Honey and Tar Compound will have a soothing effect, relieving irritation and permitting sleep.

Here's a typical instance of the relief and help that comes through the use of Foley's Honey and Tar Compound: "My little girl had a severe cold a short time ago," says Mrs. D. Oikson, of Youngstown, O., "and coughed almost continuously. I tried lots of cough remedies and had the doctor treat her, but she did not get any better. My sister recommended Foley's Honey and Tar Compound to me and I decided to get some for my child. The first dose I gave her relieved the inflammation in her throat and after using only one fifty cent bottle the cough left her and her throat and lungs were entirely free from inflammation. Since that time I always keep a bottle of Foley's Honey and Tar Compound in the house in case of emergency, as I know it is a sure cure for coughs and colds. It was the means of saving my little girl and I recommended it highly."

THE MUSCOVY DUCK.

This Fowl Needs Little Attention and Thrives on the Range.

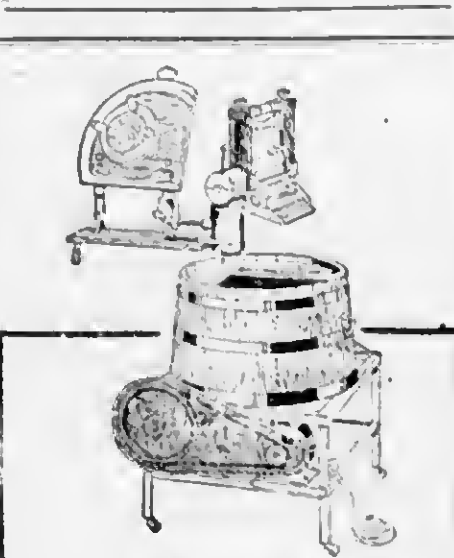

The profitable turkey is fastidious and exacting. Chickens demand continuous service. Guinea fowls relieve their semi-independence. Geese, after the first few weeks, board themselves. Of them all, from first to last, the Muscovy is chiefly self supporting and least troublesome. Again and again have I seen a Muscovy mother hatch and rear her brood without a loss, writes a correspondent of the Country Gentleman.

When one has battled with ph, with vermin and with digestive troubles in chickens and turkeys, one turns comfortably to the hearty little Muscovy duck with its powers of assimilation. From the beginning he is a forger. Every day and all day he devotes for his living.

Though the Muscovy wanders, it always comes home, at least it has

The Muscovy duck is a hardy bird that thrives with little care and is a great forager. By many it is considered the fowl for excellence. By nature rather suspicious, the Muscovy may be easily tamed, but is as quickly alarmed. They are the fowls of all the duck family, and their quack is rarely heard. The picture shows a black Muscovy drake.

known but one. That one would disappear in the spring to return in the fall with a numerous brood.

Of the several breeds perhaps the white is more popular for an economical reason—its feathers. Other breeds are larger and, I am inclined to think, harder. Unless one is in the business of raising pure bred fowls a mixture is no disadvantage. If a cross with Peking or Indian Runner ducks occurs the mongrel is inferior and as such is listed lower in market quotations.

One drake and three ducks are a popular number for the flock. Shelter is not necessary except in winter, which is a hardship to them, but a house to which they can repair each night tends to make them antsy. They require a moderate range and revel in ditches, ponds or creeks. From these they obtain the insects and grubs that contribute to their carnivorous needs. Young Muscovies are partial to flees. They make a funny picture running round a sleeping calf in the pasture, dextrously snapping up the flees.

The ducks may be allowed to raise their families without interference, even so much as cooping them at night except to feed soft meal dough at a regular time. After two or three days the feeding hour is established. With clockwork regularity the mother will appear, importantly marshalling her brood, which marches in Indian file. Even when uplifted in terror her voice is but a shadow, but she speaks imperiously and exacts obedience.

Little ducks raised by the mother should have the tips of the right wings clipped, a harmless operation when they are a few days old. This is an effective tam on their flying when they become full feathered.

In common with turkeys Muscovy ducks fatten only while ranging. When they are to be killed they may be confined a week or two on a corn and water diet. If shut up longer they lose flesh.

HOW TO KILL TURKEYS.

Most Common Method is by Sticking Them in the Mouth.

The most common way of killing turkeys is to hang them up by their legs and stick them with a knife in the mouth, making one or two cuts diagonally across the roof of the mouth while moving the point of the knife forward from the edge of the skull.

After sticking, the birds are bled by running the point of the knife under the eye or into the roof of the mouth in such a way as to strike the inside of the skull directly between the eyes. The knife may be slightly twisted when the point reaches the brain, the bird giving a characteristic quiver when properly bled, after which the feathers pick easily.

The feathers are usually picked in the following order: Flights, main tail, back, sides, breast, legs and thighs. Turkeys are usually dry picked and shipped undrawn to market. The long wing feathers bring a good price on the market. The methods of killing and dressing turkeys and chickens are practically the same.—Prairie Farmer

THE VALUE OF SALT IN THE BATHROOM.

Salt is not only a necessity in the kitchen, but it will work wonders in the bathroom. It is the cheapest and best of nerve tonics and the finest of skin lotions. Salt is so handy in the bathroom just what it is to food in the kitchen. In fact, it is the solution offered by nature to most of our beauty and health queries.

Every one has heard of the splendid strengthening effects of salt water bathing, but few think of taking salt water baths in their own tubs. Sea salt can be bought in any drug store, and a large bag should be kept on hand in the bathroom.

When you come home tired out and nervous try a salt bath. You will find it invaluable for weakness and nervousness, and you will find that a month of the home salt bath treatment will take away all traces of that "tired feeling." In fact, the woman who bathes in salt water two or three times a week feels too vigorous and strong ever to know that tired sensation.

If the skin on the face or throat is flabby you will find a salt massage of the greatest benefit. This will make the skin firm and strong. Just take a half handful of salt and rub it into the skin—not too hard, for the roughness of the salt will irritate and irritate the flesh, but gently and evenly. After a soft but thorough salt massage wash the face off with cold water.

The action of the salt, whether used dry or in the bath, is to soothe the circulation and to stimulate the nerves. This in turn makes the skin clearer, the color better and the general surface firmer and smoother.

Salt as a tooth powder is also at its best, for it whitens the teeth and hardens the gums.

When salt is such an aid to health and beauty and is so very cheap every bathroom should hold it.

"The idea," exclaimed the intensely sympathetic woman, "of disturbing the poor little birds just for your selfish pleasure!"—Washington Star.

"Who is your political candidate for county office? Treasurer, sheriff, clerk, prosecuting attorney, register of deeds, judge of probate, and many minor offices will be filled this year. A CHEF AND A CHAUFFEUR

Story of the Newly Rich.

By CLARISSA MACKIE

When the Doolans fell heir to Uncle Peter Doolan's accumulated millions they gave away the modest grocery business in Sunset and sped to New York, prepared to storm the citadel of society. Once there, established in a luxuriously appointed mansion, they promptly lost their identity as the Doolan family and became known as the "Peter Paul Doolands."

"If it wasn't for Cherry, here, we never could have done it," sighed Mrs. Dooland, looking affectionately at her daughter.

"Done what, mother?" Cherry asked sharply. She was a slender, fair girl with an apple blossom complexion, dark blue Irish eyes, long black curling lashes and dusky hair.

"This," Mrs. Dooland waved a fat white hand, sparkling with precious stones. "Society!"

Cherry dropped to her knees beside her mother's chair.

"Mother," she said tensely, "we are not really in 'society,' as you call it. We have a few friends as rich and lonely and out of place as ourselves, and so we cling together, but we are all unhappy! Let us go back to Sunset!"

"Cherry, stop! Give up all this?" Mrs. Dooland's voice was horror-stricken.

"It's deadly dull," drooped Cherry.

"Dull! What's the child wanting?" grieved Mrs. Dooland, forgetting her newly acquired accent. "You, with your fine clothes, automobiles and the-aters and dancing and all! What would your poor father say?"

He would confess that he was tired of the glitter and emptiness. I know he would rather be back in Sunset, even in the old grocery store with his crouches around him and—"

"Be still, child," interrupted her mother harshly.

"And you, too, mother. I know you miss the old neighborhood life and the village meetings and—"

"Hush, Cherry!" broke in Mrs. Dooland in a pinky tone. "The very idea of my giving up all this—for the kitchen!"

"But you wouldn't have to work any more. We could build a nice house and have servants!"

A tap at the door interrupted Cherry's coaxing. A servant stood there, a very smart parlor maid, of whom the Doolands were rather in awe.

"Excuse me, madam, but there's a person to see about an advertisement," she said.

Mrs. Dooland looked puzzled. Then her face cleared.

"Oh, yes. I told Peter to advertise for a chef and a new chauffeur. That Frenchman was so reckless I couldn't stand him. Send him up, Mary."

Mary rushed, and Mrs. Dooland turned to Cherry, who was standing by the window looking dreamily out at the passing show on the avenue.

"See here, Cherry Dooland!" hissed her mother through set teeth. "If your homesickness is due to your pinning for that good-for-nothing Jimmy Lee, who's nothing but a clerk in the Sunset pharmacy, why?"

Another tap at the door, and Mary ushered in a tall young man, who looked a nervous bow as Mrs. Dooland put up a forefinger and surveyed him coldly.

As a matter of fact, Mrs. Dooland could not visualize clearly through the lens and in secret reverted to her old fashioned steel-bowed spectacles.

All she saw was a tall figure, a blur of dark features. She heard a level, rather monotonous voice.

"Well," she said kindly, "I understand you are looking for a position?"

"Yes, madam."

"Are you a chef, or, of course, you are a chauffeur?"

"Both, madam."

"Both?"

"Yes, madam."

"The best," breathed Mrs. Dooland, starting from the applicant to Cherry's still form in the window. "What is your name?"

"James—James."

"James James? Well, James, what experience have you had in driving cars?"

Modestly James told Mrs. Dooland that he was a recent graduate of a well known school for automobile drivers and his experience was limited to a four weeks' engagement with Mrs. Hollisworth Smyth.

"And why did you leave, James?"

"Mrs. Smyth died suddenly, madam."

Mrs. Dooland was startled.

"Automobile accident?" she asked sharply.

"Providence," corrected James respectfully.

"You had better see Mr. Dooland, James. He will know better what your requirements should be. This is his office address."

"Thank you, madam."

"If Mr. Dooland is not satisfied that you can drive our car you might return here, James. Perhaps you can cook better than you can drive."

"Yes, madam, thank you," said James, and he respectfully withdrew.

"Cherry, what did you think of him?"

Cherry came from the window, her eyes shining, an odd look in her lovely face.

"Of the chauffeur, or the chef?" she asked, dimpling with smiles.

"Both!" said Mr. Dooland and caught her. "It is time I came to see you."

smile like that, Cherry, tryd. "Are you so unhappy?" she asked wistfully.

"Not at all," assured Cherry, kissing her mother on both cheeks.

"If you want you can go back to Sunset tomorrow. You can board at Mrs. Flood's for a while, and maybe—"

"I'm not going, mother. I wouldn't go for the world!" she ended emphatically.

"Not even—even to see Jimmy Lee?"

"I wouldn't go to Sunset to see Jimmy Lee—now," assured Cherry with dancing eyes, and Mrs. Dooland was satisfied that the budding romance was indeed blighted.

At dinner that night Peter Paul Dooland looked across the cozy round table at his wife.

"I hired that young feller for chauffeur," he said abruptly.

"If you hadn't I should have hired him to cook. He could do either," laughed Mrs. Dooland.

"So you liked the James?" mused Dooland; then, suddenly, to Cherry he added, "What did you think of him, honey?"

"She never even saw him. Stood looking out the window all the time," cut in Mrs. Dooland.

Cherry smiled vaguely and changed the subject. She knew that the servants were secretly laughing at them for making so much of this business of hiring a chef or a chauffeur. Cherry hated these superior servants, and a fierce loyalty to her parents prompted her to be especially tender with them that evening.

"You are more like Cherry Dooland of Sunset days," said Peter Paul, stroking her dark hair.

"I love Cherry Dooland, and I love Charlotte Dooland," smiled Cherry.

A silence brooded over the three Doolands, who before the millions came had been happy Doolands. At last Peter Paul roused himself.

"I had a letter from Finch today. He says the business is running down."

"It lacks your hand, Peter," said Mrs. Dooland, and Cherry knew they were all thinking of the old happy days.

The following day Mrs. Dooland and Cherry went shopping.

The new chauffeur drove the shining car.

Mrs. Dooland was distinctly dismayed at James' reckless driving.

"He will kill us, Cherry," she gasped as they dodged in and out of the maze of vehicles, to stop abruptly at the traffic officer's whistle.

Cherry was pale, perhaps with fear, but her eyes shone.

"Would you like to change to a taxi, mother?" she asked.

"Yes. Tell James to stop at Buffum's."

Cherry picked up the tube.

"Huffum's, James," she ordered. The limousine drew up at the curb, and James opened the door.

"I will meet you at the Plaza for lunch, mother," and before Mrs. Dooland could recover her breath the limousine shot away up the avenue.

"The park, James," said Cherry.

When they reached the park, passing a soda fountain, Cherry called a halt.

"A cherry phosphate," she said to the chauffeur.

"Yes, Miss Dooland." He touched his cap and walked a few hundred yards toward a tiny confectionery store.

When he returned he carried a brimming glass of dark red liquid.

"Thank you, Jimmy," she said, smiling at him over the glass.

"James, if you please, Miss Dooland," he said, and his lips were white.

"Miss Dooland, if you please, Jimmy," she mocked him.

For awhile he was silent, gazing at her with his heart in his eyes.

"Why did you do it, Jimmy?" whispered Cherry.

"You know! I wanted to come, and then—your father sent for me."

"Father? Then he knows?" breathed Cherry.

"Yes. I was glad to be near you, although I did not expect to be recognized by your fashionable friends. It wasn't that hope, Cherry—I mean Miss Dooland."

"Dooland? Pooh!" Cherry snapped her fingers. "I am Cherry Dooland and will be until—" She paused.

"And will be until?" he prompted.

"Until I'm not," she flashed back. Jimmy Lee, that while then coat you wore in the drug store was vastly more becoming than this one!"

"Ah, Cherry, you really mean it?" he asked eagerly.

Cherry held out the glass.

"Taste it, Jimmy," she commanded, but first she touched the brim with her own lips. "Taste it, Jimmy."

He took glass and little hand in his and tasted the bitter concoction.

"It's nectar," he murmured.

"The same old Jimmy," she whispered, and tears were in her eyes.

That night at dinner the Doolands had a guest, one whose presence caused a titter of amusement among the servants.

It was James, the chauffeur, who appeared to be equally popular with Cherry's parents.

After dinner, while they sat in the cozy library, Mary, the parlor maid, brought a telegram.

Open mouthed with surprise, Peter Paul Dooland read it aloud. It was from his lawyers in San Francisco:

"Just learned your Uncle Peter's son, reported dead, is alive. Arrived from Australia today. 'Chinus entire fortune. Accept sympathy. Come at once.'"

The Doolands stared at one another and then at Jimmy Lee.

"Thank God!" they said in unison. And thus the Doolands gave back to the James their old happy, common-place life.

Rise will also be a fine time to see you of us and of the people who are in the park or street.

Boy Scouts Relate Slanderous Report Concerning Their Scout Master.

Save Money Farmers by Buying

During the past few days a report has been circulated to the effect that Mr. Vinyard, who is managing our club rooms, has been persuading boys away from their own churches and Sunday schools, which is absolutely false and entirely opposite to the truth.

We take great pleasure in saying that he has never asked us to come away from our own church or Sunday school or in any way influenced us to do so, but has continually urged us to be loyal to our own church, Sunday school and young people's societies.

We greatly appreciate the kind efforts on his part for us and greatly regret that any such misunderstanding should have arisen.

THREE BELLS A STANDARD SCHOOL

These windows can be opened in mild weather for ventilation purposes.

The schoolhouse was already equipped with a ventilating system, a Waterbury, which they bought three years ago during a former contract with Mr. Peaslee. The evil effects of the old stove in the middle of the room are too well known to be mentioned here. It is enough to say that these people threw away that old iron stove long ago and joined the fast-increasing brigade of fresh air enthusiasts.

They have a few double seats, but every seat fits the child who has to sit in it. The seats of one size are in one row and they are the correct number of inches apart. Mary may sit erect and work at the same time. Johnny doesn't have to double up like a ball to write his numbers, or stretch his ankles to make his toes reach the floor.

Best of all are the extra touches which the school board added, the few extras which make the school worth while. The wall was re-tinted, sanitary towels furnished, books bought and the hallway re-modeled. Most schoolhouses have wide halls where the boys can wrestle if they want to and kick over their dinner pails or knock down the girls' hats. But here the partitions are moved over so the entry way is just a little wider than the doorway. There is nothing to do but come in and go straight through to the schoolroom. This gives more room for each classroom, the girls' at one side and the boys' at the other. In each cloakroom is installed a chemical indoor sanitary toilet of the Kaustine order. These toilets are in use and working splendidly all through the southern part of the state. The cost is $50.00 per seat, but, if the sanitary condition and warmth of the room could prevent one case of

J. E. Redman and wife left Monday for a three weeks visit at the home of Mr. Redman's parents at Columbiaville, Indiana.

The Misses Mary and Beryl Niles, teachers in the public schools, spent the week's end with their parent in Petoskey.

Miss Enid Todd leaves this week for Grand Rapids, where she will take up the studies in the business college at that place.

Miss Mary E. Clarke returned last week from a five weeks visit at the home of Rev. and Mrs. H. A. Putman of Ludington.

Miss Marjorie Weaver leaves the latter part of the week for Grand Rapids, Detroit and Ypsilanti to visit friends and relatives.

The members of the Congregational Sunday school are to have a potluck supper in the church parlors on Friday evening, February 11th.

Mrs. Chas. S. Danto, who left Charlevoix last week to visit at the home of her daughter in Jackson, slipped on the icy sidewalks Saturday and broke her wrist.

John Vodka, who is in the employ of A. F. Young, moved his family here last Thursday from Chicago and will occupy the Wood cottage on Dixon avenue.

Mr. and Mrs. Fred H. Thomas returned Saturday from Caledonia, where they were called by the illness and death of Mrs. Thomas' mother, Mrs. B. C. Harkness.

The Benjamin Brown harness shop has undergone numerous changes the past week. New shelving and show-cases have been installed, making a decided improvement in the appearance of the store.

The meddler with his little hammer is again busily engaged in his favorite pastime. Regardless of the good work some people manage to accomplish, the everlasting knock, knock, of the knocker is usually heard.

Elmer Mayne of Bellaire was in the city Tuesday.

Mrs. John Cook slipped and fell on the icy sidewalk, Monday, at the corner of Grant and Mason street, with the result that she is suffering from a broken bone in her wrist and otherwise badly shaken up.

Mrs. B. C. Harkness, mother of Mrs. Fred H. Thomas, died Thursday, January 27, at her home in Caledonia. Mrs. Harkness was quite well known in this city, having spent some weeks at various times at the home of her daughter.

The supper for the benefit of the "Boys' Club" will be served in the club rooms in the basement of the Baptist church on Wednesday, February 9, from 5:30 o'clock until all are served. The ladies are preparing an excellent bill of fare. Come.

Mayor O. E. Wilbur wishes through the Courier to state that he will not be a candidate for re-election to the office of mayor of Charlevoix at the coming election. He says he is perfectly willing to let someone else assume the responsibilities of the office that he has occupied during the past year.

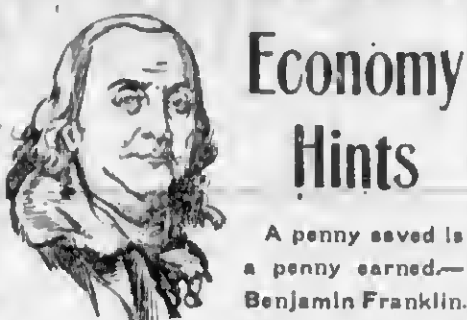

A card from Charles Lamphear states that shortly after his arrival at Flint, he was fortunate in securing a fine position in the Chevrolet Automobile factory and since has hardly missed a day. He also states that the weather has been very mild there during the entire winter, with little snow.

The officials of the Congregational church with their families took possession of the parsonage last Friday night and helped the pastor and Mrs. Taggart celebrate their thirtieth wedding anniversary. A potluck supper was served and an impromptu program of songs, recitations and amusing anecdotes made the evening pass pleasantly and quickly.

George Glasgow was a quite badly bruised Saturday, when a part of the curbing on the new Auld avenue sewer gave away. The plank used for curbing in some manner gave away, catching him just back of the ears. Some 20 minutes elapsed before he was taken from his perilous position. His injuries, while painful, are not of a serious nature.

Clinton P. Soper, vice-president and trustee of the Charlevoix Summer Home Association, and a well known summer resident of this city for the past ten or twelve years, died suddenly on Monday, January 25, at Pasadena, California, of heart disease. The sudden demise of Mr. Soper will be regretted, not only by Charlevoix residents, but those of the association with whom he has been identified during the years past.

Economy Hints

A penny saved is a penny earned.—Benjamin Franklin.

THE housewife makes a great woman because she has so many interruptions from tradesmen, so many calls from delivery boys and that her day is one long reception line to the grocer, the iceman, the butcher, the baker, the vegetable boy, etc. But viewing this reception line from the other end of the glasses, how about the time and trips the housewife wastes for each of these who bring her supplies? Is the delivery boy's time not worth something? Does it make no difference to the iceman if he has to stop the wagon, go round the entry and up the eight back steps for nothing?

Dealers in various lines have figured out the daily cost for their delivery service. Every call, every knock at the back door, has a definite cash value. The dealer ostensibly pays it, but ultimately it is the housewife consumer who pays it in higher prices. The more unnecessary delivery service the more the running expense of the dealer and hence less profit which he must make up somewhere else.

It is truly only the inefficient housewife who cannot master the daily tradesman situation. Phone calls demanding four or five deliveries a day indicate the sloppiest of wasteful management. Even with such luxuries as vegetable peddlers a definite understanding can be made as to the two or three special days on which they are to call. The writer lived for the winter months in a somewhat fashionable suburb. Every day at about 8:30 a. m. an order boy called from each butcher, grocer, fish and vegetable store. What a waste of good shoe leather, because certainly if we need a box of cornstarch and a bottle of olives tomorrow we can perfectly well order them today. Or if we are living in any way removed from barbarians who know not where they are going to rush out and catch their next meal we can and must plan meals ahead.

But perhaps it is a poor iceman for whom our pity arises at this season. We hesitate to think that any woman looks with envy on the economic independence of the average iceman. Starting on his rounds at 3 a. m., alternately driving a clumsy wagon and handling and carrying hundreds of pounds of frozen water until late at night, sometimes as late as 10 o'clock on summer Saturday nights—cannot the housewife assist in alleviating his lot?

How many times we pervert the iceman to come all the way around only to tell him (as we take his time to look while he is there) that we do not need any ice today. The end system is gaining foothold, but it should be more universally and strictly adhered to. If we need ice let us put out the card, but do not let us waste the iceman's time and that of his team in fruitless calls at our back door.

Hot Weather Comfort.

The pores should be left as wide open as possible if you do not wish to suffer excessively from the heat. This does not mean that you should never try to stop perspiration, because if your glands excrete too rapidly you will have to take some means of reducing your condition to a normal one.

Perspiration should not be allowed to remain on the body any longer than necessary, as it is not only unpleasant, but unhealthy. During warm weather bathing can scarcely be too frequent. Tepid baths are best of all during the hot weather, for hot baths are much too heating, and cold baths stimulate the circulation to such a degree that the after effects are positively glowing.

To regulate the flow of perspiration an astringent in the bath is less harmful than applying it directly to the skin. Alcohol is, of course, cooling and refreshing, but it is very apt to produce dry wrinkles because of its drying effect. Toilet waters are less inclined to do so, but if the skin shows any indications of dryness after using one a good cold cream must be rubbed in at once to restore the natural grease which the hot water has absorbed.

Never apply powder till the skin is dry. Powder and moisture paste up skin pores, which should be kept open in order to excrete perfectly.

How to Use the Succulent Onion as Medicine.

Onions supply a complete cure in themselves for cold, as well as being a wonderful remedy in cases of influenza. An onion cure breakfast includes a poached egg on toast, three tablespoonsful of fried onions and a cup of coffee. Lunchcons of sandwiches made of brown bread, buttered and filled with fine chopped raw onion, seasoned with salt and pepper, make the second meal on the schedule. For the supper the onions may be fried as for breakfast and eaten with a chop and a baked potato. The efficacy of onions is well known to the singers of Italy and Spain, who eat them every day to improve the quality of their voices and keep them smooth. Onion plasters are prescribed to break up hard coughs. They are made of fried onion placed between two slices of old muslin. The plaster is kept quite hot until the patient is snugly in bed when it is placed on the chest, to stay overnight. Onion syrup is claimed by some to be unequalled as a cure for a cold in the chest.

To Their Winnings.

Visitors Put Up Fine Exhibition—Missile Defeat Charlevoix—Basketball News.

Friday night of last week Ellsworth basketball team won their third game of the season at Ross Hall from Central Lake high school team by the one-sided score of 45 to 9. The full strength of the team was not represented, as two of Ellsworth's best men were unable to attend, but the substitutes used played the vacant positions nicely.

The Central Lake team was much smaller and less experienced than the local boys and must be commended for the gameness displayed during the contest. They played a nice, clean game and had them been up against a team of their size and age would certainly have made a fine showing.

The next local game has not yet been scheduled, but will be announced later. The support given the boys by the large attendance at the games is encouraging.

Missile Won.

Saturday afternoon the Charlevoix Boy Scouts basketball team went down to defeat before the Ellsworth Missile to the tune of 38-18. The Charlevoix boys played a fine game. They are under the leadership of Rev. L. C. Vinyard, who is doing a fine work for the boys in that town through his interest in their club work and athletics.

The ladies of the village have also become interested in basketball this winter and are devoting some time each week to practice. Quite an interesting game was played by two picked teams Saturday night of last week, which was thoroughly enjoyed by those present.

John VanHouten of Atwood was in the village Wednesday morning to take the train en route to South Dakota, where he will spend two weeks visiting with friends and relatives.

Mrs. A. L. Ely left on Saturday for Traverse City, where she will stay for a short time with her sister, who broke her leg by slipping on the ice. Mr. Ely will sojourn at the Orient Hotel during his wife's absence.

A representative of the American Insurance Fire Engine Co., is in the village, helping us to get support for buying a new chemical engine. It is time we had some sort of fire protection and buying of a chemical engine is a step in the right direction.

At the annual meeting of Traverse Bay Telephone Company held at Central Lake recently the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, L. Armstrong of Alden; vice president, W. G. Mudge; secretary and general manager, W. D. Hicken; treasurer, A. J. Dole of Bellaire; directors—A. F. Anderson, George Klooster and Harry Warner. A dividend of 7 per cent was ordered paid to the stockholders.

Lynn Evans returned home from Boyne City last Saturday.

Mr. and Mrs. Richardson spent Sunday at the home of Adolph Cincush.

Born, to Mr. and Mrs. Cook, a fine baby boy. He was born Sunday morning.

Miss Nellie Gullas is visiting at the home of her sister, Mrs. Clarence Isman.

Mr. and Mrs. Murphy were at the home of Mrs. Murphy's father, Mr. Flora, Saturday and Sunday.

Mr. Evans has changed his fish house from the Ellsworth lake to Pine lake, where he hopes to meet with better success fishing.

The thaw and rain has made many ponds around here and the water raised to such an extent that there were times last week when the water ran over the road in the St. Clair swamp.

Mr. Cincush is going to remove his mail box from the East Jordan route to the Miles school corner and in this way receive his mail from Ellsworth instead of East Jordan.

The rain and frost have made travel very miserable. As is said, "there is never a loss without some gain," and this we see by the fine skating. The Intermediate lakes from Six Mile, to Torch lake were smooth as glass and Saturday and Sunday the lakes were the seat of a good many "bumps," "duckings," fun and physical exercise.

Political Announcement.

I hereby announce my candidacy for Judge of Probate on the Republican ticket for Antrim county and respectfully ask your consideration and vote at the coming primary for another term in this important office. We enjoyed some fine skating last week.

Miss Maude Hosler is working for Mrs. M. H. Dingman for a short time.

Our average attendance has been very low since the holidays because of sickness and bad roads.

We have changed the time of our Sunday School to 10:30 in hopes of having a larger attendance.

Next Friday evening everyone is invited to the home of Owen Carpenter to the "Singing School."

There were only a few present at Sunday School and League Sunday because of the slippery roads.

Clarence Marray and John McMillan were Sunday afternoon were callers at the home of Neil Somerville.

Lula Dingman, Theresa, Clarence and Dan Hosler were neither absent nor tardy during the first four months of school.

George E. Murray sold three head of cattle to Mr. Miller of Central Lake, but was unable to take them away Monday because of the icy roads.

Janet and Bertha McMillan, Lula Dingman, Beale Martin, Lorna, Ernest Peter, Paul, Nina and Israel Somerville were all absent most of the past week.

We are learning some new songs now. The little folks learned "The Snowbird" and "Hey Diddle Diddle." The older pupils learned, "The Skater's Song" the past week.

FIGHTING THE HESSIAN FLY.

Pest is on the Increase and Should Be Combated.

The 1915 wheat crop was cut down to the extent of seven million bushels by the depredations of the Hessian fly, says the Iowa Homestead. This pest seems to be on the increase, and in those localities where it has made its appearance wheat growers can well afford to take certain precautions against its spread.

The real damage to the wheat is not done by the mature fly, but rather by the maggots or larvae. In a contribution to the Iowa Agriculturist Professor R. L. Webster points out that in some cases as many as fifteen or twenty maggots will appear on a single plant. In this case so much nutriment is taken up by these pests that the wheat dies, and if the entire crop is not a total loss it is so greatly injured that the yield is materially cut down. These insects cause wheat to lodge so badly that it is almost impossible to take it up with a binder.

In discussing control measures Professor Webster advises the plowing under of infected stubble. After harvest is the best time to take measures against the Hessian fly. All summer is spent in the flaxseed stage on wheat stubble, where the insect can easily be found. Stubble may be burned over soon after harvest. This destroys a large percentage of the insects. There are, however, some undesirable features about this measure. It does not get all the Hessian, since some are on the plants below the soil. In Kansas, according to Messrs. Headlee and Parker, plowing wheat stubble under was found a more efficient measure than burning it over.

Infested wheat stubble should be disked immediately after harvest. This makes plowing easier and conserves moisture. Then three or four weeks later the field should be plowed under at a depth of six inches, completely burying all stubble.

Volunteer wheat allows the insect to breed readily, and flies easily go from this to sown wheat. All volunteer wheat should be destroyed by disk and harrowing.

By sowing wheat as late as possible and yet obtaining a good start, much benefit may be obtained, although there is danger of winter killing if sowed too late. The idea in late sowing is that the wheat may come up in a time in the fall when most of the flies have disappeared.

Late sowing benefits only so far as the fall generation of the insect is concerned. All wheat is liable to infection in the spring, so that late sown wheat is open to injury then as well as that sown early. But if late sown wheat escapes damage in the fall the chances for injury are greatly reduced in the spring, since the majority of the flies will deposit eggs in the field where they emerge.

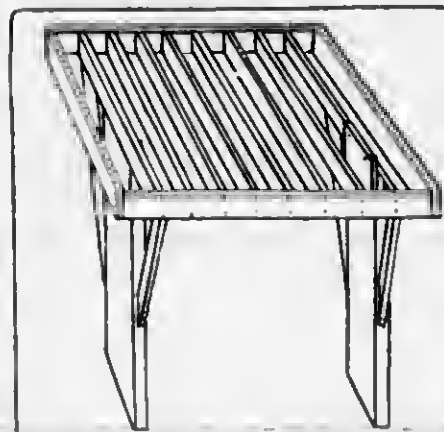

Not infrequently late sown wheat becomes heavily infested in the spring. This is usually due to infestation from other nearby wheat.

Some fifteen years ago, in Ohio, F. M. Webster gave approximately safe dates at which fall wheat may be seeded and escape severe injury by the Hessian fly. More recently, Headlee and Parker gave similar dates for the wheat growing section of Kansas. From the Kansas dates and also from observations by Professor Webster in southwestern Iowa, it appears that wheat sown Oct. 1 in the southern tier of counties should escape the fall brood of the fly. For the latitude of central Iowa this date would be about Sept. 25.

Do not follow wheat with wheat, advises Professor Webster. Many cases of severe infestation by the fly occur when wheat follows on old wheat stubble. This is because the insect is carried over in the stubble or in volunteer wheat that comes up in the stubble. The chances for damage are always less where wheat follows some other crop than wheat.

Rack For Airing Milk Pans.

A slatted rack for airing milk pans and other milk utensils may be made easily. A shelf 3 by 4 1/2 feet will hold a good many vessels. The slats are made of 1 by 2 inch strips placed four inches apart. The shelf or rack may be put on posts as illustrated, writes T. L. Bailey in the Missouri Valley Farmer. Vessels may be turned upside down upon it, and they will catch the air from underneath.

Corn For The Silo.

The best time to cut corn for the silo is when the ears are well ripened and before the leaves have become dry, says A. C. Army of the Minnesota experiment station.

This conclusion has been reached as the result of experience. The early practice was to cut corn while it was still quite green. But analysis revealed the fact that the feed value increased as maturity of the plant approached, and the practice therefore changed. In some cases to the other extreme. The best results, however, seem to be from corn cut as indicated.

New Food Package Law.

Manufacturers and packers of foods sold in packages and bottles will be required after Sept. 3 next to show on the wrapper or label the net weight or volume of the contents as a result of an order recently issued by the United States department of agriculture. In the case of some classes of articles the contents may be stated by numerical count where this method gives accurate information as to the quantity of food in the package. The figures given on the label must represent the actual quantity of food exclusive of wrappings and container.

Forfeited Citizenship.

The law upon the subject of forfeited citizenship reads as follows: "When any naturalized citizen shall have resided two years in the foreign state from which he came or five years in any other foreign state it shall be presumed that he has ceased to be an American citizen, and his place of abode shall be deemed his place of residence."

A short discussion of two corrections made in our items by some of the Courier's staff proved that we were correct in spelling staid instead of stayed and in using have begun instead of began. With reference to the above, if the students will look on page 2029 of Webster's New International Dictionary, column one, fourth definition, they will find the meaning of the word "staid." Mr. T. "stayed" with Mr. V. over night, meaning that he remained at a certain point. He was not referred to as sober, grave, steady, sedate, fanciful, etc., as is given the definition of the word "staid." We stand corrected in the use of the word "began" in place of "began." (Ed)

Dr. Thad Lewis, of Central Lake, well known in this city, died Tuesday afternoon at his home in that village after a week's illness with pneumonia. Deceased was about 55 years of age and was the only physician located there. Funeral services take place Thursday.

The winning side in the I. O. O. F. attendance contest which closed on Wednesday night of last week was won by the side captained by Richard Lewis. The contest was an interesting one, there being but two points at the final count between the winners and losers. The penalty to the losers was to serve a pot luck supper to the winner, which is taking place to-night (Wednesday).

The times are certainly out of joint. On July 5, 1915, the thermometer registered as low as 52 and on the 6th it went down to 50. On January 27, 1916, it climbed to 53 and on the 28th to 55. Yet in July the men wore two-piece summer suits because it was summer, while last week they had on their overcoats and heavies because it was winter. The women were more consistent, for they have been wearing both summer and winter furs and were always in season and in style.

Wallace Brothers of Bay Shore, well-known farmers of that section, won the first premium in the Fifth Annual Seed Exhibition of the Michigan Experiment Association connected with the Michigan Agricultural College at East Lansing, the prize being awarded them for quality oats. They sent a peck of oats from their ten-acre field of this grain, which yielded them 950 bushels this last season. They also received the gold medal for quantity yield given by the Quaker Oats people. And still there are farmers who insist that bumper crops cannot be raised in Charlevoix county.

How to Utilize Odd Bits of Soap You Have Saved.

Save the odd bits of toilet soap, the more expensive and highly perfumed ones as well as the Ivory. When you have a good pile then let them shine in a little water on the back of the stove. When quite dissolved add violet water or any desired perfume and a few drops of lemon juice. Pour into desired mold and allow to harden. A delightful perfume soap will be the result. Treat all bits of yellow common kitchen soap by themselves. You will be surprised to see how much good soap you would have wasted had you thrown away the useless bits.

How to Cure Freckles and Not Injure Skin.

Many women acquire what are called summer freckles that appear almost immediately on exposure to the sun and disappear a little while after the victim stays in the house.

The best treatment for these summer freckles is to bathe them frequently with pure soap and water, using a good face brush and rubbing the freckles until they are almost irritated. This friction excites the circulation beneath the skin. A good cold cream should be applied after the scrubbing.

The Bridal Wreath.

The bridal wreath is usually formed of myrtle branches in Germany. It is made of orange blossoms in France as well as in the United States. In Italy and the French cantons of Switzerland it is of white roses. In Spain the flowers of which it is composed are red roses and plums. In the islands of Greece the leaves serve the purpose, and in Bohemia rosemary is employed. In German Switzerland a crown of artificial flowers takes the place of the wreath.

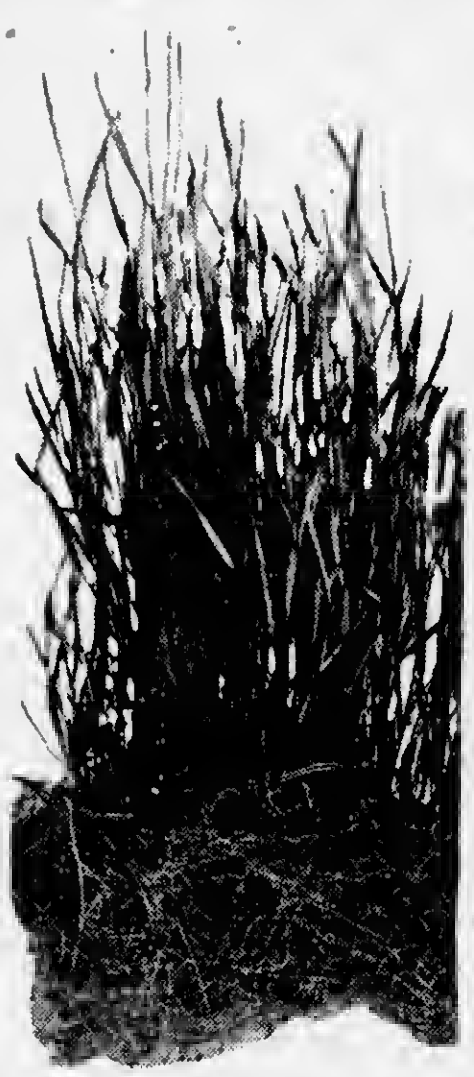

Scientific Farming

DESTROYING QUACK GRASS.

Methods Employed by a Minnesota Farmer in Attacking the Weed.

A Minnesota farmer outlines his method of attacking quack grass as follows in the Iowa Homestead:

As quack grass is taking possession of some of our best land throughout the central west, I thought perhaps a few words relating to my experience in dealing with it might set some one thinking and consequently benefit him. In my early experiences with quack grass, which came first in small spots, I tried killing out with salt. I could kill it entirely if I used salt enough, but the expense was out of reason, and, besides, when I used salt enough to kill the quack nothing else would grow on the land for years. I then tried digging and burning, but soon gave that up as a lost job. One can scarcely get all the roots by digging, and it is too expensive. I might enumerate several methods I tried, but was not entirely satisfied with any. Finally I got to thinking strongly on the subject. All the methods I had tried had been too expensive for the results obtained. I then began along a new line entirely and have found it much cheaper and very much more effective.

QUACK GRASS.

The method employed is what might be called the smothering method. The idea is this: If one can not get the quack roots in the ground he has turned an enemy to a friend. I would do this by first enriching the soil by a coat of manure or a clover crop or preferably both. Then anything I plant or sow will grow quickly, while if the land was in a lean condition my smothering crop would grow so slowly that my opportunity would be lost. A good way would be to sow the mixed grasses and clover and pasture for a couple of seasons, covering with manure while to pasture. The very tramping of the stock has a tendency to bring quack roots nearer the surface.

Late in the fall of the year after I had this treatment I would plow quite shallow and harrow down at a convenient time the following spring, then, roughly if I could spare the time. I also double disk and harrow again at odd times. About June 1, not much later, I plow again quite deep, harrow down and sow immediately in German millet, about one and one-half bushels to the acre. I sow each day as fast as I can get the millet started ahead of the quack. When my field is plowed my millet is sowed. Inside three days, if there is plenty of moisture, the millet is up and inside of ten days it covers the ground. By having the ground rich and sowing at this warm time of the season the quack will never see daylight until fall, when the millet is cut for hay, and then it is dead, root and branch, and the ground is in splendid shape for a bumper crop of corn next season. In fact, I have raised our best corn on land treated as above with scarcely a root of quack showing on land that was badly sodded the year before. By this method very little extra work is given the land save the extra plowing, a big crop of very good millet hay is grown, and a big crop of roots is rotted in the soil equal in value to a roasting of manure, and the ground is left in excellent condition for two crops of corn following.

Some have tried buckwheat in place of millet, but with not as good success, as corn does not follow buckwheat as well, and after one has got the soil into a high state of fertility by this method he naturally wants to grow corn following as small grain is very apt to lodge. Small patches of quack can be easily smothered by using tarred paper as a cover for six weeks. In using tarred paper be sure to lay the sheets well and weight down with earth. This is too expensive a treatment except on very small patches. It is very difficult to handle quack grass on land that is not well drained.

Flaxseed Meal for Horses.

Question—I have flaxseed ground and am feeding about a handful twice a day with other grain to my horses. Is this a good horse feed? Is there danger of feeding too much?

Answer—I am not able to answer this question from personal experience, nor have I been able to find records of feeding experiments in which flaxseed meal has been used. With just a word about the difference between flaxseed meal and oilmeal, I will give the results of a trial with oilmeal at the Iowa Experiment Station.

The difference between these two feeds lies principally in the oil content, the oilmeal having only one-fifth the oil found in flaxseed meal. On the other hand, on account of its loss of oil the oilmeal contains the carbohydrates and protein in more concentrated form. There is, however, about five per cent. of oil left in the oilmeal.

At the Iowa station a 100-day trial was made with three work teams, all the horses being fed on corn and oats and oilmeal, but team-mates receiving them in different proportions. It was found that the three horses getting corn and oilmeal instead of most of the oats in the ration did as much work and lost less in weight than the three getting more oats and less corn and oilmeal. The ration heavy in oilmeal, 1.1 lbs., and corn, 14.1 lbs., with 2.6 lbs. of oats cost 1.6 cents less per day than the other ration of corn, 7.3 lbs., oats, 10 lbs., and one-tenth pound of oilmeal. The limit to its use seems to be the laxative tendency of the oilmeal, which prevents its too free use with horses, especially in summer.

sickness, would it not be a paying proposition? If the fact that both classrooms are under the direct supervision of the teacher could prevent your little boy from seeing one obscene picture or could save your little girl from hearing one immoral story, would it be worth $100 to you?

This day marked the beginning of a new era for Eveline No. 2. Under the guidance of their earnest leader and teacher the district board has wisely spent the money that was raised for this purpose. Whenever there was any question as to the wisdom of any change in the schoolroom they wrote directly to the state department. The Lansing architects and decorators advised them, telling them just what was best in every detail. They were sure of every step and have succeeded in their purpose.

At the close of the program, in behalf of the state department, School Commissioner May L. Stewart dedicated the building to truth and health and presented to them their well-deserved and hard-earned "Standard School" plate.

SAVE 60C PER GALLON ON PAINT

We are starting to move into the New Hardware Store Building and the next stock we wish to move is PAINT.

Paint has advanced in price from 15c to 25c per gallon since last fall. The price then was $2.10 per gallon and the Spring price will be at least $2.35 per gallon.

We are changing our PAINT LINE from PENINSULAR to B. P. S., not because Peninsular was not good paint but because we think B. P. S. is better for us to handle on account of its popularity with some of our good customers, and being known as one of the best paints made.

Our line is broken so far as a full line of colors is concerned, but if the shades we have left appeal to you, take it home at, per gallon $1.75

Up to and including February 10th

when the SPRING PRICE will prevail. Every drop guaranteed by us the same as if you paid the full price. The above applies to OUTSIDE HOUSE PAINT, but we will also sell all of our old stock of paint at prices in same proportion.

This is a saving of 60 cents per gallon and should appeal to anyone who is figuring on painting in the Spring.

SYNOPSIS.

John Bellamy Smart, unmarried and heir to a fortune, while abroad with his secretary, Poppendyke, and his valet, Britton, buys a dilapidated castle on the Danube in care of the Schmuckers and discovers a mysterious woman inhabiting one of the towers.

Smart falls to better down a huge door leading to the east wing in search of the fair lady. He interrupts a visit of American relic hunters.

Their ensuing attempt to buy some of the castle's ancient furniture results in their discomfiture and hurried departure. Smart catches a glimpse of his fair neighbor's waiting maid.

Another visit to the mysterious east wing fails, but later the beautiful stranger strikes up an acquaintance with the new owner through a secret tunnel.

Smart adds the countess to his list of his wife's acquaintances and tries to throw the count off the track.

Smart dines with the countess in celebration of the departure of the count and other guests and she speaks of buried treasure.

The newspapers publish statements in which Smart is made to say he upholds Count Tarnowsky in everything. Smart sends a denial.

The count invites the "fool" to lend him $10,000 for which he offers doubtful security. He shows resentment when the money is refused.

Smart is informed he is in love, an impression his secretary aids in creating by sending flowers to the countess. Bangs, a lawyer, reports to the countess.

Count Tarnowsky and a Mr. Schwartzmuller visit the castle, offering to restore ancient frescoes for $10,000. Blows are struck, and the count draws a pistol.

The countess unfolds a plan whereby her mother, Mrs. Titus, hopes to get her safely out of the country.

Smart motors to the railroad station to meet Mrs. Titus, but she arrives with her sons, Colingraft and Jasper, by a different route.

CHAPTER XVIII.

I Traverse the Night.

THE next day I was very lousy, preparing for the journey by motor to the small station down the line where I was to meet Mrs. Titus and her sons. It seemed to me that every one who knew anything whatever about the arrangement went out of his way to fill my already rattled brain with advice.

Just before leaving the castle for the ferry trip across the river that evening I was considerably surprised to have at least a dozen brand new trunks delivered at my landing stage. It is needless to say that they turned out to be the property of Mrs. Titus, expressed by grande vitesse from some vague city in the north of Germany. They all bore the name "Smart, U. S. A.," printed in large white letters on each end, and I was given to understand that they belonged to my own dear mother, who at that moment, I am convinced, was sitting down to luncheon in the Allrods, provided her habits were as regular as I remembered them to be.

I set forth with Britton at 11 o'clock in a drizzling rain. At half past 11 o'clock we were skidding over the cobblestones of the darkest streets I have ever known, circling like a drunken sailor, but not half as surely, headed for the Stansbushhof, to which we had been directed by an object in a raincoat who must have been a policeman, but who looked more like a hydraunt. It was pouring pitch-forks.

"Britton," said I wearily, "have you ever seen anything like this?"

"Once before, sir," said he. "Stagnant falls, sir."

At half past 12 the train from Munich drew up at the station, pointed awhile in evident discomfit and then moved on.

A single passenger alighted—a man with a fussy air. There was no sign of the Tituses.

We made a careful and extensive search of the station, the platform and even the surrounding neighborhood, but it was quite evident that they had not left the train. There was a pretty pass! Britton, however, had the rather preposterous idea that there might be another train a little later on. It did not seem at all likely, but we made inquiries of the station agent. To my surprise—and to Britton's infernal delight—there was a fast train, with connections from the north, arriving in half an hour. It was, however, late, owing to the storm.

Just ten minutes before 3 the old-fashioned guard came in and roused us from a mild sleep.

"The train is coming, mein herr."

"Thank goodness!"

"But I neglected to mention that it is an express and never stops here."

My right hand was still in a bandage, but it was so heavily heated that I could have used it without discomfort—note my ability to strive a motorcar—and it was with the greatest difficulty that I restrained a mad impulse to strike that guard full upon the nose, from which the raindrops coursed in an interrupted descent from the visor of his cap.

The shrill, childish whistle of the locomotive reached us at that instant. A look of wonder sprang into the eyes of the guard.

"It is going to stop, mein herr!" he cried. "It has never stopped before!" He rushed out upon the platform in a great state of agitation, and we trailed along behind him, even more excited than he.

A conductor stepped down from the last coach, but one and prepared to assist a passenger to alight. I hastened up to him.

"Permit me," I said, elbowing him aside.

A portly lady squeezed through the vestibule and felt her way carefully down the steps. Behind her was a smallish, bewhiskered man, trying to raise an umbrella inside the narrow corridor, a perfectly impossible feat.

She came down into my arms with the helplessness of one who is accustomed to such attentions, and then wheeled instantly upon the fragile individual on the steps above.

"Quick! My hat! Heaven preserve us, how it rains!" she cried in a shrill, wheezy voice and—in German.

"Moth"—I began instinctively, but the sacred word died unspoken on my lips. The next instant I was scurrying down the platform to where I saw Britton standing.

"Have you seen them?" I shouted wildly.

"No, sir. Not a sign, sir. Ah, see!" He pointed excitedly down the platform.

"No!" I rasped out. "If my poor stretch of the imagination can that be Mrs. Titus. Come, we must ask the conductor. That woman? Good Lord, Britton, she waddles!"

The large lady and the smallish man passed us on the way to shelter, the latter holding an umbrella over her but with one hand and juggling a heavy hamper in the other. They were both exclaiming in German. The station guard and the conductor were bawling and scurrying in their wake, both carrying boxes and trunks.

No one else had descended from the train. I grabbed the conductor by the arm.

"Any one else getting off here?" I demanded in English and at once repeated it in German.

He shook himself loose, dropped the bags in the shelter of the station house, doffed his cap to the imperious backs of his late passengers, and scuttled back to the car. A moment later the train was under way.

"Can you not see for yourself?" he shouted from the steps as he passed me by.

Once more I swooped down upon the guard. He was strutting the large German lady into a small, lopsided carriage, the driver of which was taking off his cap and putting it on again after the manner of a mechanical toy.

"Go away," hissed the guard angrily. "This is the mayor and the mayress. Stand aside! Can't you see?"

"When does the next train get in?" I asked for the third time. He was still bowing after the departing train.

"Ach, Gott!" he gasped. Collecting his thoughts, he said: "There is no train until 9 o'clock in the morning. Nine, mein herr."

"Ach, Gott!" groaned I. "Are you sure?"

"Jah! You can go home now and go to bed, sir. There will be no train until 9, and I will not be on duty then. Good night."

"I dare say we'd better be starting home, sir," said Britton thickly. "Something's gone wrong with the plans, I fear. They did not come, sir."

"Do you think I am blind?" I roared. "Not at all, sir," he said in haste, taking a step or two backward.

By the time we succeeded in starting the engine after crawling for nearly half an hour I was so consumed by wrath over the sorry trick Mrs. Titus had played upon us that I swore she should not enter my castle if I could prevent it. Moreover, I would take delight in dumping her confounded luggage into the Danube. We then had trouble with the lamps. At last we were off, Britton at the wheel. I shall not describe that diabolical trip home. It is only necessary to say that we first lost our way and went on for twelve kilometers in the wrong direction; then we had a blow-out and a quick detachable rim. Subsequently something went wrong with the mud-caked machinery, and my unfortunate valet had to be on his back in a puddle for half an hour. Eventually we sneaked into the garage with our trembling car and overrode manfully with the men who had to wash her.

"Good heavens, Britton!" I exclaimed suddenly.

He looked at me in astonishment. I admit that the ejaculation must have sounded weak and effeminate to him after what had gone before.

"What is it, sir?" he asked, at once resuming his status as a servant after a splendid hiatus of five hours or more in which he had enjoyed all of the by-products of capriciousness.

"Poppendyke!" I explained, against my best judgment of him. The poor devil has been waiting for us three miles up the river since midnight! What do you think of that?"

"No such luck, sir," said he grumpily. "Lack! You heartless rascal! What do you mean by that?"

"Two big Schmucks," I took a moment for thought. "We must telephone to the castle and have Hawkes and Conrad out with word to them." I looked at my watch. It was twenty minutes past 7. "I suppose no one in the castle went to bed last night. Good Lord! What a scene for a force!"

We retraced our steps to the garage, where Britton went to the telephone. I stood in the doorway of the building staring gloomily, hollow-eyed at the well, at nothing, now that I stop to think of it. The manager of the place, an amiable, jocular descendant of Lazarus, approached me.

"Quite a storm last night, Mr. Schmuck," he said, rubbing his hands on an oil rag. I gruffly agreed with him in a monosyllable. "But it is lovely today, sir. Heavenly, sir."

"Heavenly?" I gasped.

"Ah, but look at the glorious sun!" he cried, waving the oil rag in all directions at once.

The sun? Upon my word, the sun was shining merrily. I hadn't noticed it before.

"Well, I'm dashed!" I said, with a silly grin.

"The moon will shine tonight, Mr. Schmuck," he began enthusiastically. "Smart, if you please!" I snapped.

"Ah," he sighed, rolling his eyes. "It is fine to be in love."

A full minute passed before I grasped the meaning of that soft answer, and then it was too late. He had some about his business without waiting to see whether my wrath had been turned away. I had been joy riding!

The excitement in Britton's usually imperishable countenance as he came running up to me from the telephone closet prepared me in a way for the startling news that was to come.

"Has anything serious happened?" I cried, my heart sinking a little lower.

"I had Mr. Poppendyke himself on the wire, sir. What do you think, sir?" A premonition! "She she has arrived!" I demanded dully.

He nodded. "She's, sir. Mrs.—your mother, sir, is in your midst."

The proximity of the impulsive manager explains this extraordinary remark on the part of my valet. We both stared at the manager, and he had the decency to move away. "She arrived by a special train at 12 last night, sir."

I was speechless. The brilliant sunshine seemed to be turning into something night before my eyes. Everything was going black.

"She's asleep, he says, and doesn't want to be disturbed till noon, so he says he can't say anything more just now over the telephone because he's afraid of waking her." (Britton drops then when excited.)

"He doesn't have to shout so loud that he can be heard on the top floor," said I, still a trifle dazed.

"She appears to be sleeping in your bed, sir, he says."

"In my bed? Good heavens, Britton, what's to become of me?"

"Don't take it so, sir," he made haste to say. "Blanchford has fixed a place for you on the couch in your study, sir. It's all very snug, sir."

"But, Britton, I said in horror, 'suppose that I should have come home last night. Don't you see?'"

"I daresay she had the door locked, sir," he said.

"By special train," I mumbled. A light broke in upon my revolving intellect. "Why, it was the train that went through at a mile a minute while we were in the coffee house. No wonder we didn't meet her!"

"I shudder to think of what would have happened if we had, sir," said he, meaning no doubt to please me. "Mr. Poppendyke says the countess has been up all night worrying about you, sir. She has been distracted. She wanted you to go out and search for you at 4 o'clock this morning, but he says he assured her you'd turn up all right. He says Mrs. Titus—the elderly lady, begging your pardon, sir—thought she was doing for the best when she took a special. She wanted to save us all the trouble she could. He says she was very much distressed by our failure to 'see' some one meet her with a launch when she got here last night, sir. As it was, she didn't reach the castle until nearly 1, and she looked like a drowned rat when she got there, being her—exposed to a beastly rain-storm. See what I mean? She went to bed in a dreadful state, he says, but he thinks she'll be more pleasant before the day is over."

I burst into a fit of laughter. "Hurrah!" I shouted exultantly. "Well, by Jove, I don't feel half as bad as I did five minutes ago. Come, let us be off."

We started briskly down the street. My spirits were beginning to rebound. Poppendyke had said that she worried all night about me. She had been distracted! Poor little woman! Still I was glad to know that she had the grace to sit up and worry instead of going to sleep as she might have done. I was just mean enough to be happy over it.

Poppendyke met us on the town side of the river. The seemed a trifle haggard, I thought. He was not slow, on the other hand, to announce in hurried strokes that I looked like a ghost.

"You must get those wet clothes off at once, Mr. Smart, and go to bed with a hot water bottle and ten grains of quinine. You'll be very ill if you don't. But a lot more elbow grease into those trousers, Max. Get a move on you. Do you want Mr. Smart to die of pneumonia?"

CHAPTER XIX.

I Meet Mrs. Titus.

WE were crossing the muddy stream by secretary, his teeth chattering with cold and excitement combined, related the story of the night.

"We were just starting off for the house up the river, according to plans, Max and Rudolph and I with the two boats, when the countess came down in a mackintosh and a pair of gum boots and insisted upon going along with us. She said it wasn't fair to make you do all the work and all that sort of thing. While we were arguing with her—and it was getting so late that I feared we wouldn't be in time to meet you—we heard some one shouting on the opposite side of the river. The voice sounded something like Britton's, and the countess insisted that there had been an accident and that you were hurt. Mr. Smart, and outbawling would do but we must send Max and Rudolph over to see what the trouble was. It was raining cats and dogs, and I realized that it would be impossible for you to get a launch on that side at that hour of the night."

"It was nearly 1—so I sent the two Schmucks across. I've never seen a night as dark as it was. The two little lanterns bobbing in the boat could hardly be seen through the torrents of rain, and it was next to impossible to see the lights on the opposite landing stage—just a dull, misty glow."

"To make the story short, Mrs. Titus and her sons were over there, with absolutely no means of crossing the river. It took two trips over to fetch the whole party across. Raining pitch-forks all the time, you understand. Mrs. Titus was fuming at the mouth because you don't own a yacht or at least a launch with a canopy top or a life-preserver or something of the sort."

"I didn't have much of a chance to converse with her. The countess tried to get her upstairs in the east wing, but she wouldn't climb another step. I forgot to mention that the wharf was out of order and she had to climb the hill in mud six inches deep. The Schmucks carried her the last half of the distance. She looked as sleepily in the hall or the study—anywhere but upstairs. I assumed the responsibility of putting her in your bed, sir. It was either that or—"

I broke in sarcastically. "You couldn't have put her into your bed, I suppose."

"Not very handsly, Mr. Smart," he said in an injured voice. "One of her sons occupied my bed. Of course it was all right, because I didn't intend to go to bed as it happened. The old or son went upstairs with the countess. She gave up her bed to him, and then she and I sat up all night in the study waiting for a telephone message from you. The younger son explained a good many things to us that his mother absolutely refused to discuss. She was so mad when she got here. It seems she took it into her head at the last minute to charter a special train, but forgot to notify us of the switch in the plans. She traveled by the regular train from Paris to some place along the line, where she got out and waited for the special which was following along behind, straight from Paris too. A wonderful waste of money. It seemed to me. Her idea was to throw a couple of plain clothes men off the track, and by George, sir, she succeeded. They thought she was coming from a train to some place in Switzerland and went off to watch the other station. Then she sneaked aboard the special, which was chartered clear through to Vienna. See how clever she is? If they followed on the next train or telegraphed it would naturally be to Vienna. She got off at this place, and—well, we have her with us, sir, as smart as a flea in a rug."

"What is she like, Fred?" I inquired.

"I confess that I hang on to his reply. 'I have never seen a wet hen, but I should say on a guess that she's a good bit like one. Perhaps when she's thoroughly dried out she may not be so bad, but'—he drew a long, deep breath—"but upon my word of honor she was the limit last night. Of course one couldn't expect her to be exactly gracious, with her hair plastered over her face and her hat spoiled and her clothes soaked, but there was really no excuse for some of the things she said to me. I shall overlook them for your sake and for the countess." He was painfully red in the face.

"The conditions, Fred," I said, "were scarcely conducive to polite conversation."

"Int, hang it all, I was as wet as she was," he exploded so violently that I knew his soul must have been tried to the utmost.

"We must try to make the best of it," I said. "It will not be for long." The thought of it somehow sent my heart back to its lowest level.

He was grim and silent for a few minutes. Then he said, as if the thought had been on his mind for some hours: "She isn't a day over forty-five. It doesn't seem possible, with a six foot son twenty-six years old."

Gruffly I explained, "They marry quite young when it's for money, Fred."

"I suppose that's it," he sighed. "I fancy she's handsome, too, when she hasn't been rained upon."

We were halfway up the slope when he announced nervously that all of my dry clothing was in the closet off my bedroom and could not be got at under any circumstance.

"But," he said, "I have laid out my best frock coat and trousers for you and a complete change of linen. You are quite welcome to anything I possess, Mr. Smart. I think if you take a couple of rolls at the bottom of the trousers they'll be presentable. The coat may be a little long for you, but—"

My loud laughter cut him short.

"It's the best I could do," he said in an aggrieved voice.

I had a secret hope that the countess would be in the courtyard to welcome me, but I was disappointed. Old Greel met me and wept over me, as if I was not already sufficiently moist. The chief came running out to say that breakfast would be ready for me when I desired it; Blanchford felt of my coat sleeve and told me that I was quite wet; Hawkes had two large, steaming towels waiting for us in the vestibule apparently fearing that we could get no farther without the aid of a stimulant. But there was no sign of a single Titus.

Later I ventured forth in Poppendyke's best suit of clothes, the one he uses when he passes the plate on Sundays in faraway Yonkers. It smelled of moth balls, but it was gloriously dry, so why carp? We sneaked down the corridor just my own bedroom door and stole into the study.

Just inside the door I stopped in amazement. The countess was sound asleep in my big armchair, a fair but lovely thing in a pink peluche. Her rumpled brown hair nestled in the angle of the chair; her hands drooped listlessly at her sides; dark lashes lay upon the soft white cheeks; her lips were parted ever so slightly and her bosom rose and fell in the long swell of perfect repose.

Poppendyke clutched me by the arm and drew me toward the door or I might have stood there transfixed for heaven knows how long.

"She's asleep," he whispered.

"It was the second time in twelve hours that some one had intimated that I was blind."

The door creaked villainously. The giant, ecclesiastical tails of my borrowed frock coat were on the verge of being safely outside with me when she cried out, whereupon I swiftly transposed myself and stuck my head through the half open door.

"Oh, it's you!" she cried, in a quavery voice. She was leaning forward in the chair, her eyes wide open and eager.

I advanced into the room. A look of doubt sprang into her face. She stared for a moment and then rather pitilessly rubbed her eyes.

"Yes, it is I," said I, spreading my arms in such a way that my hands emerged from the confines of Poppendyke's sleeves, if upon my word, I had no idea that he was so much longer than 15. "It is still I, countess, despite the shrinkage."

"The shrinkage?" she murmured, slowly sliding out of the chair. As she snatched her cramped leg she made a little grimace of pain, but smiled as she limped toward me, her hand extended.

"Yes, I always shrink when I get wet," I explained, resorting to face thinness.

Then I bent over her hand and kissed it. As I neglected to release it in time, the cuff of Poppendyke's best coat slid down over our two hands, completely enveloping them. It was too much for me to stand. I squeezed her hand with painful fervor and then released it in trepidation.

"Poppendyke goes to church in it," I said vaguely, leaving her to guess what it was that Poppendyke wore to church in, or, perhaps, knowing what I meant, how I happened to be in it for the time being. "You've been crying."

Her eyes were red and suspiciously moist.

As she met my concerned gaze, a wavering, whimsical smile crept into her face.

"It has been a disgustingly wet night," she said. "Oh, you don't know how happy I am to see you standing here once more, safe and sound, and—available. I expected you to growl and growl."

"On a bright, glorious, sunshiny morning like this?" I cried. "Never! I prefer to be graciously reluctant. Our troubles are behind us."

"How good you are!" After a moment's careful scrutiny of my face she added, "I can see the traces of very much thought, Mr. Smart, since recent ones."

"They were black until I came into this room," I confessed. "Now they are rose tinted."

She bent her slender body a little toward me, and the red seemed to leap back into her face as if propelled by magic. Resolutely I put my awkward, ungainly arms behind my back and straightened my figure. I was curiously impressed by the discovery that I was very, very tall and she very much smaller than my memory recorded. Of course I had no means of knowing that she was in bedroom slippers and not in the customary high-heeled boots that gave her an inch and a half of false stature.

"Your mother is here," I remarked hurriedly.

She glanced toward my bedroom door. "Oh, what a night!" she sighed. "I did all that I could to keep her out of your bed. It was useless. I did cry, Mr. Smart. I know you must hate all of us."

I laughed. "Love thy neighbor as thyself," I quoted. "You are my neighbor, countess. Don't forget that. And it so happens that your mother is also my neighbor at present, and your brothers too. Have you any cousins and aunts?"

"I can't understand how any one can be so good natured as you," she sighed. "The crown of her head was on a level with my shoulder. Her eyes were lowered. A faint line of distress grew between them. For a minute I stared down at the bow in the crest of her head, an almost unconquerable impulse pounding away at my sense of discretion. I do take credit unto myself for being strong enough to resist that opportunity to make an everlasting list of myself. I know even now that if a similar attack ever came upon the again I should not be able to withstand it."

All this time she was staring rather pensively at the second button from the top of Poppendyke's coat, and so prolonged and earnest was her gaze that I looked down in some concern, at the same time permitting myself to make a nervous, jerky and quite involuntary digital examination of the aforesaid button. She looked up with a nervous little laugh.

"I shall have to saw one on right there for poor Mr. Poppendyke," she said, poking her finger into the empty buttonhole. "You dear bachelors!"

Then she turned swiftly away from me and glided over to the big armchair, from the depths of which she fished a small velvet bag. Looking over her shoulder, she smiled at me.

"Please look the other way," she said. "Without willing for me to do so she took out a little gold box, a powder puff and a stick of lip rouge. Crossing to the small Florentine mirror that hung near my desk, she proceeded before my startled eyes to repair the slight—and to me unnoticeable—damage that had been done to her complexion before the sun came up."

"Woman works in a mysterious way my friend, her wonders to perform," she paraphrased calmly.

"No matter how transcendently beautiful woman may be, she always does that sort of thing to herself. I take it," said I.

"She does," said the countess with conviction. She surveyed herself critically. "There! And now I am ready to accept an invitation in breakfast. I am disgustingly hungry."

"And so am I!" I cried with enthusiasm. "Hurray! You shall eat Poppendyke's breakfast just to penalize him for failing in his duties as host during my unavoidable—"

"Quite impossible," she said. "He has already eaten it."

"He has?"

"At half past 1, I believe. He announced at that inglorious hour that he couldn't have his coffee the first thing in the morning he would be in for a headache all day. He suggested that I take a little nap and have breakfast with you—if you succeed in surviving the night."

"Oh, I see," said I slowly. "He knew all the time that you were napping to that chair, eh?"

"You shall not scold him!"

"I shall do even worse than that. I shall punish him for life."

She appeared thoughtful. A little frown of annoyance clouded her brow. "He promised faithfully to arouse me the instant you were sighted on the opposite side of the river. I made him stand in the window with a field-glass. No, on second thought, I shall scold him. If he had come to the door and shouted you wouldn't have caught me in this odious dressing gown. He knew!"

"It is most fascinating," I cried. "Adorable! I love flimsy, pink things. They're so intimate. And Poppendyke knows it, bless his lugenacious old soul."

I surprised a queer little gleam of inquiry in her eyes. It flickered for a second and died out.

"Do you really consider him an ingenuous old soul?" she asked. And I thought there was something rather unstable in her voice. I might have replied with intelligence if she had given me a chance, but for some reason she chose to drop the subject. "You must be famished, and I am dying to hear about your experiences. You must not omit a single detail. I—"

There came a gentle, discreet knocking on the half open door. I started.

"Come!" I said.

Blanchford gravely swung the door wide open.

"Breakfast is served, sir—your lady."

ANNUAL TAX SALE.

STATE OF MICHIGAN, [s. s.]
County of Charlevoix.

The Circuit Court for the County of Charlevoix in Chancery.

In the matter of the petition of Oramel B. Fuller, Auditor General of the State of Michigan, for and in behalf of said State, for the sale of certain lands for taxes assessed thereon.

On reading and filing the petition of the Auditor General of the State of Michigan, praying for a decree in favor of the State of Michigan, against each parcel of land therein described, for the amounts therein specified, claimed to be due for taxes, interest and charges on each such parcel of land, and that such lands be sold for the amounts so claimed by the State of Michigan.

It is ordered that said petition will be brought on for hearing and decree at the February term of this Court, to be held at Charlevoix, in the County of Charlevoix, State of Michigan, on the 7th day of February, A. D. 1916, at the opening of the Court on that day, and that all persons interested in such lands or any part thereof, desiring to contest the lien claimed thereon by the State of Michigan, for such taxes, interest and charges, or any part thereof, shall appear in said Court, and file with the clerk thereof, a notice of contest, and their objections thereto on or before the first day of the term of this Court above mentioned, and that in default thereof the same will be taken as confessed and a decree will be taken and entered as prayed for in said petition.

And it is further ordered that in pursuance of said decree the lands described in said petition for which a decree of sale shall be made, will be sold for the several taxes, interest and charges thereon as determined by such decree, on the first Tuesday in May thereafter, beginning at 10 o'clock a. m. on said day, or on the day or days subsequent thereto as may be necessary to complete the sale of said lands and of each and every parcel thereof, at the office of the County Treasurer, or at any convenient place as shall be selected by him at the County seat of the County of Charlevoix, State of Michigan; and that the sale then and there made will be a public sale, and each parcel described in the decree shall be separately exposed for sale for the total taxes, interest and charges, and the sale shall be made to the person paying the full amount charged against such parcel, and accepting a conveyance of the smallest undivided fee simple interest therein; or, if no person will pay the same, then the whole parcel shall be offered and sold, and charges and taxes shall be paid for the time being, and shall, on the succeeding day, or before the close of the sale, be reoffered and sold, on such second offer, or during such sale, the same cannot be sold for the amount aforesaid, the County Treasurer shall bid off the same in the name of the State.

Witness the Hon. Frederick W. Mayne, Circuit Judge, and the seal of said Circuit Court of Charlevoix County, this 2nd day of November, A. D. 1915.

FREDERICK W. MAYNE, Circuit Judge.
RICHARD L. LEWIS, Register.

STATE OF MICHIGAN.

To the Circuit Court for the County of Charlevoix in Chancery:

The petition of Oramel B. Fuller, Auditor General of the State of Michigan, for and in behalf of said State, respectfully shows that the list of lands hereinafter set forth and marked "Schedule A," contains a description of all the lands in said County of Charlevoix upon which taxes were assessed for the years mentioned therein, and which were returned as delinquent for non-payment of taxes, and which taxes have not been paid; together with the total amount of such taxes, with interest computed thereon to the time fixed for sale, and collection fees and expenses, as provided by law, extended against each of said parcels of land.

Your petitioner further shows to the Court that said lands were returned to the Auditor General under the provisions of Act 266 of the Public Acts of 1893, as delinquent for non-payment of said taxes for said years, respectively, and that said taxes remain unpaid; except that lands included in said "Schedule A," for taxes of 1890 or prior years were returned to the Auditor General as delinquent for said taxes under the provisions of the general tax laws in force prior to the passage of Act 266 of the Public Acts of 1893, and which taxes remain unpaid.

Your petitioner further shows that in all cases where lands are included in "Schedule A," as aforesaid for taxes of 1890 or of any prior year, said lands have not been sold for said taxes or have been sold for said taxes, but delinquent taxes and the sale or sales so made have been set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction, or have been canceled or provided by law.

Your petitioner further shows and avers that the taxes, interest, collection fees and expenses, as set forth in said "Schedule A," are due from the several parcels of lands described in said schedule.

Your petitioner further shows that the said taxes on said described lands have been returned for non-payment of taxes, and the same being now due and remaining due and owing to the State of Michigan, your petitioner prays a decree in favor of the State of Michigan against each parcel of said lands, for the payment of the several amounts of taxes, interest, collection fees and expenses, as computed and extended in said schedule against the several parcels of land contained therein, and in default of payment of the said several sums computed and extended against said lands, that each of said parcels of land may be sold for the amounts due thereon, as provided by law, to pay the lien aforesaid.

And your petitioner will ever pray, etc.
Dated November 22nd, 1915.

ORAMEL B. FULLER,
Auditor General of the State of Michigan, for and in behalf of said State.

PRICE $1.50 PER YEAR

BIG SEASON FOR AUTOS IN 1916

Local Dealers Enthusiastic Over Prospects of Summer Business.

Many New Improvements are Being Included on 1916 Models—Some Prices Lower.

The man with the auto fever is already beginning to size up the various models of the 1916 cars, or figuring on repairs and tires for a big summer's run with his old machine. The auto shows in the cities are drawing immense crowds and all over the country the prospects point toward the biggest year ever recorded in the history of the automobile.

Many cars are being reduced in price, others that are making no reduction are adding new equipment. Considering the high cost of steel and the advanced cost of labor, the American made automobile is about the lowest priced car on market of the world. There certainly is a car for everybody, a car to suit the taste of the most fastidious, a car for the speed artist, or the conservative lines of "everyman's" car. But no matter they are all one thing an "automobile," and whether a man drives a Ford or a $3000 limousine, he belongs to that great body of pleasure seeking Americans who consider motoring the national pastime.

The local dealers are contracting for larger numbers of cars than any previous season and fear less in not being able to supply the demand. All are very enthusiastic over the prospects of the season.

Following is a brief outline of the different dealers and what they are offering to the motor loving public this season.

Benjamin Brown, garage on Bridge street, will continue to handle the Overland and the popular Ford. Mr. Brown has disposed of 47 cars since last April and figures that he has prospects of double this number of sales, on the combined cars, during the coming season. The Overland has reduced the price of their 83-B model car from $750.00 to $695.00 and are including an improvement in the motor. They have also reduced the price of the Model 75 roadster to $590.00, and same model touring car to $615.00. The Ford will still continue to sell for $440.00 and the roadster for $390.00. On January 26 the Ford company at Detroit counted up 127,485 orders for cars for immediate delivery. The factory is running full blast, turning out over 2000 cars a day. Mr. Brown has just received his first shipment of Fords, to the number of 12, to be followed in a short time with an equal number. His first shipment of Overlands are about due and the two cars combined will make a wonderful showing and should enable a prospective buyer to quickly make a choice. He will continue to give the same good service in the garage as during the past year and will have competent help to care for the troubles of the automobile driver. His line of Ford repairs will be larger than ever and with a line of Goodrich and Firestone tires will have the most completely equipped garage in the county.

At the Central Garage, of which A. L. Hart & Son are proprietors, everything is being put into readiness for a big season. These gentlemen will have the agency of the Haynes and Monroe autos. The Haynes manufacturers have promised something out of the ordinary in cars this season, and the Monroe has added several changes to their car.

The recently erected Hooker garage is being well equipped preparatory to a big season. These gentlemen confine their operations to garage repairs and automobile supplies only. The new building is a fine one, with floor space to care for a large number of cars.

Other automobile repair men in the city are now busily engaged in overhauling cars placed in their hands to be in readiness at the opening of the season. With the above lineup of cars, and efficient men to attend to repairs and breakages, Charlevoix automobilists can rest assured they will be well taken care of during the 1916 season.

Special Invitation.

We would be glad to have every person in town visit the boys' club rooms. Drop in some evening and watch the boys for a while. Please don't criticize or listen to the unjust criticism of those who do not understand until you have investigated for yourself. Come in for an hour after supper, absorb some of our "spicingrum" and you'll forever be our friend. You can't help it.

Yours for this great work and the boys,

Lloyd C. Vinyard.

ILL BUT TWO WEEKS

Pneumonia Takes Thomas Hartwell, Well Known Resident of Norwood.

After an illness of a few days over two weeks, Thomas Hartwell, a well-known resident of Norwood township, died shortly after ten o'clock Saturday night from pneumonia, brought on by a severe attack of the grippe.

Mr. Hartwell was 42 years of age and leaves to mourn his loss a wife, three children, his father, Stephen Hartwell, and a brother, William, both of this city.

"Tom," as he was always called by those who knew him, was a hard working man and stood high in the estimation of the community in which he lived. His loss is regretted by all.

Funeral services were held from the Epworth church to-day (Wednesday) at 1:00 o'clock p. m., Rev. L. C. Vinyard, officiating. Interment in Brookside cemetery.

Thursday, February 10.

Pine Lake Lodge, No. 122, K. of P., will have work in the second rank and refreshments. Every member is urged to be present. That committee of five is expected to present something interesting. Knights, come out.

FIRE CAUSES PROPERTY LOSS

Barn Used for Work Shop and Garage Goes Up in Smoke.

A. L. Hart Figures Loss on Building and Contents to Run Over Two Thousand Dollars.

Fire discovered about nine o'clock Wednesday night of last week destroyed property owned by A. L. Hart on west Clinton street to the amount of over two thousand dollars.

The fire was discovered by Ray Graves, who home is but a short distance away. Mr. Graves turned in the alarm and aroused the neighborhood. The fire had a good start when discovered and when the fire department arrived was a mass of flames. The fireman kept the flames from spreading to adjoining barns and soon had it under control.

In the barn, which had been used for a work shop and automobile shed, were four gasoline engines, a large number of tools, many boat patterns and a quantity of boat building material, a fish cork machine, turning lathe, and Mr. Hart's Monroe auto. The loss of these are figured above $2,000. Some insurance was carried on the building, tools, and the auto was also insured.

The building had stood there for many years and was as dry as tinder. Parts of the outside was lined with tar paper, which when burning made a large amount of smoke, and carried by the west wind, led residents of the city to believe a big fire was in progress. The cause of the blaze is unknown. No fire had been in the stove, used for heating the work shop, since early in the day, and it is believed by Mr. Hart to have been caused from electric wires.

TO HAVE EXTRA NUMBER

Lecture Course Committee Seizes Attraction for February 19.

To patrons of the Charlevoix Lecture Course: The Lecture Course committee has secured from the Redpath Lyceum Bureau an extra number for February 19th. This number is free to all holders of season tickets. The attraction is Miss Gay Zenola MacLaren, who is a genius in imitative recitals of famous plays. Charlevoix will be given a treat on the 19th of February. We want a packed house, and can positively assure you of a very pleasant and profitable evening.

Watch for the posters and for the announcement in the papers next week. Lecture Committee.

February Month of Note.

During the month of February several dates of especial note receive universal observance. February 12 is Lincoln's birthday; February 14, St. Valentine's Day; February 22, Washington's birthday and last but not least, February, the shortest month of the calendar year has added one more day, thus giving people born on February 29, an opportunity to celebrate four birthdays in one.

MANY CHANGES MADE IN PRIMARY LAWS—PARTY TO RULE

Persons Must Stick to Party and Cannot Vote Only on One Ticket—Petitions Must be Signed to Get Name on Ticket—Must Register to Vote—General Primary August 29.

With numerous primary elections and regular elections this year there arise many queries as to just how, when and where Michigan voters will enable themselves to participate in the selection of candidates for the many offices to be filled.

Many changes have been made in our primary laws, but to date there seems to be considerable speculation as to the time and places of holding certain primary elections.

April 3 is first

The first experience with the presidential primary will be April 3. At this time the voters of all parties shall have the opportunity, on separate ballots provided for that purpose, to express their preference as to the nomination of their respective parties for president.

The name of any candidate for such office shall be printed on the official primary ballot solely upon petition of his political supporters. The petition must be signed by not less than 100 qualified voters of a party, and the petition must be filed with the secretary of state beginning noon of March 1. The candidate receiving the highest number of votes at the April election shall be declared the candidate and choice of his party for this state.

Choosing Not Affected

This law does not affect in any way the manner of choosing delegates to the national convention. Such delegates will without doubt be selected in a convention as formerly, four at large and two for each of the thirteen congressional districts, thirty in all. The method of selecting them may, however, be changed to comply with the national platform of 1912 if any means can be devised for holding a proper primary for the election of such delegates.

Time is Changed

The legislature of 1913 attempted to provide for the election of state central committee members, but the attorney general declared the act unworkable and it was not followed in the 1914 election.

The last legislature, however, passed a law governing their election. This act does not change the method of selecting members of the committee as heretofore practiced, but enacts into law the procedure so that this is the only way that can be pursued. The act, however, does change the time of electing these officials, so that it must be borne in mind that the first convention in 1916 has this important duty to perform which spring conventions never had before.

No State Officers

In 1916 there are no state officers to be nominated for the April election, so the first convention will probably be held some time during May, at which time delegates to the national convention will be selected.

The general primary for the November election, 1916, will be held Tuesday, August 29.

Petitions for offices to be nominated in the primary must be filed, if state officers, with the secretary of state; if county officers, with the county clerk; if city officers, with the city clerk; not later than 4 p. m. central standard time, July 29.

Must Sign Petitions

The petitions for candidate for governor and lieutenant governor must be signed by a number of registered and qualified voters not less than two per cent. nor more than four per cent. of the number of votes cast by the party for secretary of state at the November 1914 election. This year not less than 2003 nor more than 5866.

Before one can legally sign a petition he must be registered. This does not mean enrolled, as under the former primary act, wherein he stated his party affiliation, but it means that he must be registered so that he could vote at any election other than the primary.

Can Cast a Vote

Any person registering on primary day shall be entitled to vote at the November election without other registration.

It is unlawful for any registered and qualified voter to sign more than one nominating petition for the same office. There is nothing in the law that prevents a Republican from signing a Democratic petition, provided he signs only one for any one office.

No Primary Held

If by July 29 it appears that there is no opposition to any candidate for any office on any ticket, then the name of that man who has no opposition in the form of petitions for other candidates for that office must be certified as the nominee and no primary can be held for that office.

All county conventions must be held on the same day, which day will be designated by the state central committee in its call for the state convention to nominate candidates for state officers.

For that county convention there must be elected at the August primary by direct vote, as many delegates as each township, ward or precinct shall be entitled to under the call issued by the county committee.

No Names Printed

No names of candidates for delegate to the county convention can be printed on the official primary ballot, but the names of such delegates may be placed upon the ballot by printed slips pasted on by the voter. The county committee in its call must indicate whether delegates are to be selected by precincts or by wards.

The county chairman must certify to the board of election commissioners, at least two days before August 29, the number of delegates to which each district in the county is entitled, and the election board must certify to the names of the delegates chosen.

Canvassers to Meet

The board of state canvassers must meet within 20 days after the August 29 primary, all county conventions must be held within 15 days after August 29, and the state nominating conventions must be held 40 days after August 29, with the call issued at least 30 days before that date.

Instead of all party tickets on one ballot, it is now provided that there shall be separate ballots for each party thus making it necessary for every voter to disclose to which party he belongs when he votes a ballot at this primary. This is the provision which was created to take the place of the obnoxious enrollment feature which was in the original act.

Ask for Ballot

When the voter desires to vote, he must ask for a ballot and the inspector shall enter his name upon the list together with the name of the party and the number of the ballot given the voter. This again stamps the voter with a party label. No person who is voted for on any party ballot for any office whose name is not printed on the ballot and who has not filed a nomination petition can be nominated.

PUTS FERRIS ON THE RACK

Ex-Governor Chase S. Osborn Tells the Public Some Truths

Regarding Stand Taken by Governor Ferris on the Boose Question.

We all know on the strength of Democratic authority—such good Democratic authority as the Detroit Times, the only Democratic newspaper of any reputation in Detroit; Dan Ensign, the most influential Democrat in northern Michigan; Edwin Frensdorff of Hudson, the big gun of Democracy of southern Michigan, and others who introduced the undisputed proofs—that Governor Ferris, for the sake of the nomination and election, sold himself, both body and soul, to the liquor element. This is beyond all question.

In a statement issued several days ago former Governor Osborn eases up the present chief executive in the following language:

"I charge that he is not the same governor; that he was before he became governor; not the same supposedly fearless citizen of Big Rapids who would reform the world if given an opportunity; who would boldly set in motion all the finer social machinery of humanity and fraternity; who would oppose all who are vicious in thought or in act."

"I charge that he has mortgaged himself to the booze crowd of Michigan and America, with a second mortgage to the politics for profit gang of reaction and destruction in the Democratic party; that he has loosed as governor and has been incompetent, negligent and cowardly. His old-time Ferris manhood has been burned upon a political pyre. He is now more of a fox than a man."

EASTER SUNDAY APRIL 23

Lent Begins on Ash Wednesday, March 8, 1916—Latest Date Since 1905.

Ash Wednesday, the first day of Lent, falls on March 8 this year. All people are acquainted with this season of the year, yet at this time it might be mentioned that this year Lent begins and ends later than it has in the past eleven years. In 1905 Easter Sunday came on April 23, the same as in 1916.

During the period of nineteen years from 1905 to 1923 inclusive, Easter Sunday comes during the month of April the total of 14 times and in the month of March 5 times. The earliest date of Easter Sunday during this period of 19 years was March 23, 1913, Lent beginning February 5 that year. The latest dates of Easter Sunday in this period of time were April 23, 1905, and April 23, 1916.

During the next seven years of this nineteen-year period Lent will begin on its earliest date February 13, 1918, Easter Sunday coming on March 31. The latest date of the beginning of Lent will be March 5, 1919, Easter Sunday falling on April 20, three days earlier than this year.

HISTORICAL SOCIETY BANQUET

Annual Event To Be Held at Masonic Hall Next Week.

Professor James H. Kaye of Marquette Booked as Principal Speaker of the Evening.

The Historical Society will hold their annual Washington-Lincoln banquet at the Masonic Hall, Friday evening, February 18th. The supper will be under the auspices of the Eastern Star ladies, who have prepared an exceptionally good menu, as follows:

Oyster Cocktail
Olives Pickles Wafers Cream Tomato Soup
Roast Turkey Mashed Potatoes
Turnips
Giblet Gravy Warm Rolls
Jelly Fruit Salad Wafers
Neapolitan Ice Cream Cake Coffee.

The literary feast will consist of good music and speaking. The program will be printed in full next week.

Professor James H. Kaye, president of the Northern State Normal School of Marquette, will be the principal speaker of the evening. Topic, "Lincoln." Mr. Kaye is a young man of ability and comes to us recommended as a pleasing speaker.

Don't miss this opportunity of helping the Historical Society, the Eastern Stars and yourselves. Buy your tickets early. They are on sale until Wednesday, February 16th.

Meet at Petoskey.

The state historical body known as the Michigan Pioneer and Historical Society will meet at Petoskey on Thursday and Friday, February 24th and 25th. Many visitors are expected and this year's midwinter meeting will probably break all previous records. Among the features of the program are papers by John C. Wright, H. S. Babcock and Thomas Linchman of Harbor Springs, Rev. Francis X. Barth of Escanaba, W. L. Jencks of Port Huron, and Adam Strom of Detroit.

COUNTY NORMAL.

(Ruth Chellis)

Rena Carroll spent Saturday at her home in Central Lake.

Miss Florence Madhugh spent Saturday and Sunday at her home in East Jordan.

J. H. Milford, state deputy game warden, made a brief visit at the normal last week.

The new set of practice teachers for the next three weeks are: Marcia Goss, sixth grade reading; Sadie Blanchard, chart class reading; Ruth Chellis and Florence Milner, third grade reading.

The normal class attended the county farmers' institute at Ironton, February 4 and 5. Various topics in agriculture were discussed which were both interesting and helpful to rural teachers.
Also, much enjoyment was derived from the trips and the dinners served at the grange hall.

Monday, January 31, the normal class were invited to the Three Bells school, which was presented a Standard plate by Miss Stewart. A fine program was rendered by the school children, consisting of recitations and songs. Short talks were given by Miss Stewart, Miss Himes, Mr. Milford, Mr. Peaslee and Mr. Wangeman. The program ended with a song by the normal class. A bountiful dinner was served by the patrons of the district at two o'clock. Mr.
Peaslee, the teacher, and the school board are to be congratulated for their interest shown in making Three Bells

the second Standard school in Eveline township.

FALL CANNING.

Practical Hints on How to Preserve Fresh Fruits.

Generally speaking, preserving means the cooking of fruits in an equal weight of sugar, long enough for the fruit to keep without being air dried.

Preserving may be done with little or much sugar and is especially useful in canning fruit, but air must be excluded.

The same general directions apply to each process.

Needed Articles.—Granite or porcelain lined kettles or steamers, with handles or handles and lips for convenience in pouring.

Perhaps the two quart size is most used, but if one can afford it several sizes will be found very convenient.

A small, sharp steel paring knife or better still, a silver plated fruit knife ground down to a fine edge, expressly for fruit paring. Other necessary articles—wooden spoons—some with sifts, a wire spoon, silver spoons, large and small, a skewer, scales for weighing, a hair sieve, a strainer and a supply of cheesecloth.

Preparation.—Observe utmost cleanliness of hands, utensils and fruit.
Avoid anything that tends to lessen color or flavor. Use only sound fruits and vegetables. Clean and scald jars and covers. Use new rubbers every season.

Blackberries.—Half cupful sugar to each pint jar, boil ten minutes.

Currants.—Three-fourths cupful sugar to each pint jar, boil ten minutes.

Huckleberries.—One-half cupful sugar to each pint jar, boil ten minutes.

Phenolics.—One-half cupful sugar to each pint jar, boil ten minutes.

Pears.—One-half cupful sugar to each pint jar, boil ten minutes.

Apples.—One-half cupful sugar to each pint jar, boil five minutes.

Peaches.—One-half cupful sugar to each pint jar, boil ten minutes.

Cranberries.—One cupful sugar to each pint jar, boil forty-five minutes.

Cherries.—Three-fourths cupful sugar to each pint, boil thirty minutes.

Ordinance-No. 129

Entitled "An Ordinance to Provide for a Central Polling place and a Central place of Registration of Electors in and for the City of Charlevoix, State of Michigan, and for the appointment of Election Inspectors and Members of the Board of Registration of Electors and to discontinue and abolish all other polling places and places of Registration of Electors in said city and to provide for the compensation of said Election Inspectors and Members of the Board of Registration of Electors."

Section 1. That the Council Room in the Carnegie Library building located on lot twenty-four (24) in block nine (9) of the city of Charlevoix, in the State of Michigan, be and is hereby designated as the sole and central polling place and place of registration of electors in and for the city of Charlevoix.

Section 2. That all other polling places and places of registration of Electors in the various wards of the city of Charlevoix be and are hereby discontinued and abolished.

Section 3. That the common council of the city of Charlevoix shall at the last meeting of said common council previous to every session of the board of Registration, appoint two persons, electors of said city, who shall constitute the board of registration of electors of said city, and said board of registration shall be governed in reference to its powers and duties by the laws relating to the registration of electors in the fourth class.

Section 4. That the common council of the city of Charlevoix shall at the last meeting of said common council appoint to every election, general or special, appoint at least five or more inspectors of election and said inspectors of election shall be governed by the general laws of the state of Michigan, in reference to their powers and duties as election inspectors.

Section 5. That the compensation of each member of the board of registration of electors shall be the sum of Three Dollars per day.

Section 6. That the compensation of each inspector of election shall be the sum of Four Dollars for all services rendered from seven o'clock a. m. to eleven o'clock p. m.; provided, however, should said inspectors of election be obliged to work longer than from seven o'clock a. m.
to eleven o'clock p. m. in the performance of their duties, then said board shall receive extra compensation at the rate of fifty cents for each hour but in no instance to receive more than Two Dollars as extra compensation.

Section 7. All ordinances or parts of ordinances conflicting with the terms of this ordinance are hereby repealed.

This Ordinance shall take immediate effect.

Adopted at the regular meeting of the common council of the city of Charlevoix, February 7th, A. D. 1916.

POULTRY NOTES.

If you intend to build a poultry house for winter use the sooner you start it the better so that it may be good and ready when the chickens are ready for it.

Don't forget to have plenty of grit for your fowls. A want of it brings on indigestion.

Charcoal is an excellent thing to keep before the birds. It absorbs the gases and is valuable in bowel disorders. It will help to sweeten the crop that has become sour.

Early hatched pullets should be placed in pens for the winter long before they settle down to laying.

It pays to buy good stock if you are contemplating going into the poultry business even as a side line. A lot of poorly bred birds are worth just market price, while pure breeds are worth many times the butcher's prices.

HENS PAY UNDER FARM CONDITIONS

[Prepared by the North Carolina agricultural experiment station]

This experiment work was begun April 2, 1914, primarily to determine first what it would cost to keep a furred flock of hens a year and just what profit, if any, could be secured.

When the work was begun there were some single comb Rhode Island Red hens on the test farm. Other good grade Rhode Island Reds were purchased in the neighborhood, making the total number of hens 100.

The hens were always to be given the run of the farm and get all they could eat on the side and around the barn and house. No account was to be made of the feed they obtained by

The typical Orpington, an English breed, whatever the variety, is a large, stately fowl, with rather short, wide set legs. The breast is full and round, the back broad and the body deep. It is a fine general purpose bird and very popular in America. The hens are good layers, and as table fowls the breed is excellent. The illustration shows a single comb Buff Orpington cock.

foraging. An accurate account has been kept of all grain and other feed given.

The chicks were fed rolled oats and corn. The object of this feeding was to use the most common farm feeds. This feed was supplemented part of the year with wheat shorts.

The chicks were fed rolled oats, cracked corn and wheat. Oyster shell was kept before them at all times. During the year the hens laid 8,574 eggs, or an average of 86.7 eggs to the hen. They were kept under actual farm conditions.

All surplus eggs were sold on the market at an average price of 20 cents a dozen, and when the increase of the flock is taken into consideration, together with the value of the eggs, the profit received amounted to $1.57 per hen. The hens consumed during the year about four tons of feed and increased in numbers to 183. Market prices for the grain was charged against the hens and all expenses for upkeep were paid by the money received from the sale of the eggs produced.

Feeding the Molting Hen.

The molting season opens in August, and the fowls are anything but attractive. This is a time in a hen's life when she must undergo a severe strain to her system. Experience has taught us that during this period, which requires 90 days of the fowl's annual life, she must be kept in the proper condition by feed. She must be neither too fat nor too lean. Consequently a ration is called for that will be pretty nearly balanced in nitrogenous and carbonaceous materials. — Farm Journal.

Curing Goose Feathers.

After plucking geese the feathers may be placed loosely in cheap muslin sacks and hung in a light, airy place. Sunlight and an occasional shaking up are helpful. The feathers are kept in sacks from three to six months, after which period they are thoroughly aired and free from unusual odor.

Look For Injured Hens.

When chicks or fowls are injured and blood shows, take the injured one away from the rest of the flock until the wound heals or it is liable to be devoured alive, for when chicks once taste blood they will never let up on picking at the wounded one.

For Croup--Mothers-- Always Keep This Handy

The day of the Croup scare is over for those parents who wisely keep Foley's Honey and Tar Compound in the home ready for instant use.

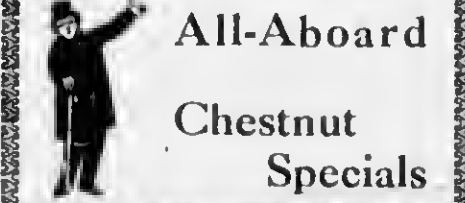

Mrs. Chas. Reitz, Allen's Mills, Pa., writes: "I have used Foley's Honey and Tar Compound for the past eleven years and would not be without it. It has saved me many a doctor's bill for croup and croup."

If toward nightfall the little ones grow hoarse and croupy, if their breathing becomes wheezy and stuffy, give them Foley's Honey and Tar Compound. Many a careful mother has been able to ward off an attack of spasmodic croup by its timely use.

If you are awakened by the hoarse, hoarse cough that means croup, give Foley's Honey and Tar Compound at once. It will ease the little sufferer quickly, cut the thick choking phlegm, and soon they will have easy breathing and peaceful quiet sleep.

A small woman traveling with her son, a boy very large for his age, handed the conductor a half-fare ticket and a whole fare one. The conductor scrutinized the son critically, and said: "But, Madam, I can't pass this boy on a half-fare ticket. He is very large and has on long trousers." "Very well," replied the woman, "use the whole ticket for him and the half-fare for me."

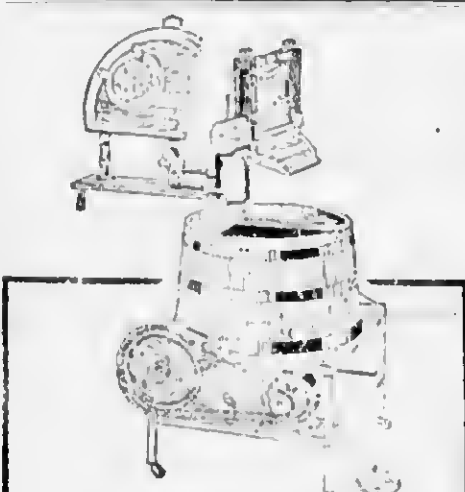

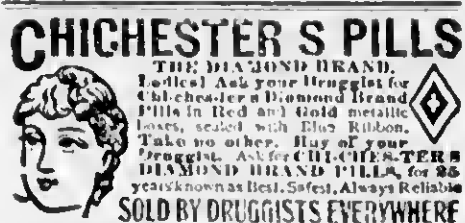

There were four of them talking confidentially in a corner of the smoker. "I tell you, boys," exclaimed a loud-voiced drummer, "I'm proud to say that no house in the country has more men pushing its line of goods than ours." "Humph! What do you sell?" asked a curious one. "Baby carriages."

Six-year-old little Willie had a beautiful governess, as his folks were very rich. One day he entered the parlor and asked his mother what an angel was. "Why, dear, it is a beautiful lady with wings, who flies. But why do you ask?" "Because I heard father call my governess an angel to-day," replied the little boy. "Oh," said the mother. "Well, dear, you watch her, and you will see her fly to-morrow."

The lesson was from the "Prodigal Son," and the Sunday school teacher was dwelling on the character of the elder brother. "But amidst all the rejoicing," he said, "there was one to whom the preparation of the feast brought no joy, to whom the prodigal's return gave no pleasure, but only bitterness; one who did not approve of the feast being held, and had no wish to attend it. Now can any of you tell me who this was?" There was a short silence, followed by a vigorous cracking of the thumb, and then from a dozen little mouths came the chorus: "Please, sir, it was the fatted calf."

DAIRY WISDOM.

Breed your cows to a pure bred, registered dairy bull from a family having large and profitable production of butter fat.

The hands and clothes of the milkers should be clean and free from dust. The finger nails of the milkers should be short and clean.

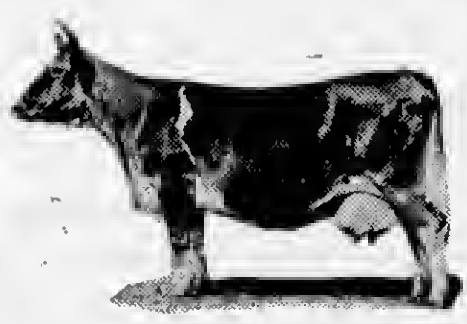

The dairymen who has alfalfa, clover or cowpea hay to go with his silage does not need to balance up the cow's rations.

The silo preserves the corn crop with the minimum amount of loss, as the entire plant is made fit for food.

To obtain the best results from any cow who must be treated with uniform kindness and fed and milked at regular times by the same person, if possible.

CLEAN MILKING ROOM IMPROVES PRODUCT

For a year or more one dairymen of the many who supplied milk to a thriving young city invariably stood at the top in the reports of the official milk inspector. Invariably milk from his dairy never classed as other than clean. writes a correspondent of the Iowa Homestead. Always bacterial count was low. Various were local comments regarding the reason for the apparent superiority of the products of this clean milk dairy. Many of the comments were wide of a true explanation. Some even hinted at commercial preservatives. One got very near to the truth when he said: "I can't see why the man with high priced sanitary barns cannot make a better showing than that dairy which hasn't one-fifth as much money invested in buildings as some of the others. There is that small place where the milking is done

The average Guernsey cow will weigh about 1,500 pounds, with the bulls weighing 20 to 300 pounds heavier. The head of the Guernsey cow is long with a slender neck. The body is large and deep, showing ample capacity for disposing of roughage. The flanks are thin. Long years of breeding for dairy production have brought out splendid animals, persistent milkers and of a uniform type. From these cattle have descended the great families of Guernseys distributed throughout the dairy sections of the world. The cow pictured is a Guernsey.

and the open shed where the cows find shelter at night, but I can't see anything superior."

The few words from his remarks, "The small place where milking is done," very nearly tell the story of the production of clean milk on that farm. The cows are clean and they are milked in a clean milking room. The milk is handled in clean vessels and is kept cool. The separate milk lug room is the big factor wherein the clean milk dairy excels the others. Being used for less than two hours each milking period, it does not become dirty at any time. The milking room is constructed strictly with regard to the production of clean milk. Cement floors, cement gutters, cement mangers, cement walls with water forced through a tank provide for cleanliness and sanitation. An almost solid row of windows enclosing the little building provides for sunlight disinfection.

The unsunning owner has wonderful faith in his separate milking room. He says that a clean milking place does much to insure clean milk.

The reports of the inspector and the comments of satisfied patrons speak volumes for the results of his effort. His method is no impractical fad. As the man quoted above said, "The clean milk dairy does not have one-fifth as much invested in buildings as some of the others." There is an idea in the plan worked out so successfully that it is worthy of thought. Possibly there is something in it worthy of emulation. Possibly there is something in the separate milking room idea that will enable some to raise the quality of their products.

The Cow at Calving Time.

After calf is born it is well to try all means to see if they are open and then leave cow and calf alone for at least six hours, says Howard's Dairymen. If conditions are normal milk all four quarters nearly dry. Do not milk the cow entirely dry until at least the fourth milking, and if udder is hot or swollen do not milk dry until this condition has subsided. Milking dry soon after the cow has calved increases the danger of an attack of milk fever.

For the Silo.

Short, immature corn should be allowed to stand until nearly dry before putting into the silo. That is, the leaves should be nearly dry and the stalk should be nearly filled with sap. If the corn is put in while too green it may make sour silage.

It is time that this nation realizes as Germany realized many years ago that preparedness means more, much more than trained soldiers, guns and ammunition. It means above all things the ability of a country to live within itself—to be self-sustaining. Ever since this war began and England's blockade became effective we have come to realize as none of us realized before, our insufficiency, our dependence. Germany produces more sugar than she can use and is one of the great sugar exporting nations of the world. America has the soil, the climate, the skill to produce an equally good article in quantities much larger than she can use, yet no sooner, under wise legislation, were we on the road to such results than a bill was passed to free list sugar. And only the war and the stoppage of German exports prevented the complete overthrow of this important industry.

America has the facilities or most of them for the production of dye stuffs and medicines heretofore imported from Germany. All that we need is to stimulate these lines of production by appropriate and friendly legislation.

These are only important illustrations. There is absolutely no reason why a nation like ours with its vast range of climatic conditions, its endless varieties of soils, its wealth of mineral resources, its wonderful inventive genius, its practical application of inventions and discoveries, its comparatively sparse population and large opportunities for more intensive cultivation, should not make the problem of our living within ourselves in case of attack from without an easy problem. Always provided these great and diversified advantages have been improved and protected. The first step toward preparedness with us should be as it was with Germany, the enactment of an adequate tariff both for revenue and protection. Not until this is done will all the military preparedness in the world be sufficient.

Once in a while somebody gets the idea that the reason the local paper does not report every scandal that comes to public notice is because the publisher is afraid. That is not the reason. The reputable newspaper—especially in a small town where everyone is a neighbor to everyone else—takes no delight in giving publicity to those things that have brought disgrace to some family or heartache to some wife or mother. It is much more pleasant to record the good things that happen, to tell about the incidents that tend to make life more endurable and that uplift rather than tear down, that bring joy instead of sorrow, pride instead of heartache. So if you don't always find in the Courier the delectable bit of gossip that would doubtless make "good reading," and if you are inclined to blame the editor because he "doesn't print all the news," consider that some home has had enough worry over unfortunate happenings and that the gossips and scandalmongers of the community can and will gladly and ghoulishly give sufficient publicity to the details to satisfy the lowest tastes. Incidentally, it might be remarked here that the most complaint of censored news comes from people who have now or have had in their lives some things they are very glad were not given newspaper publicity. There come times, of course, when it is the definite business of the local newspaper to speak right out in meeting, to tell what happened, to give open publicity to conditions that are a reproach to a community and for which the light of publicity seems the only cure. Tolerance is not a lack of courage.

THE United States has voted to bar liquor from the Philippines. Senator Townsend voted yes, but Senator Wm. Alden Smith diplomatically and politically dodged the issue by being absent. Some dodger, that William.

THERE is no quarrel between Wilson and Bryan. All there is to it is the fact that Bryan intends to defeat Wilson. But there is no quarrel. Oh, no. Ask any Wilson man.

HOW SHE WAS WON

A Story of a Statesman and a Politician.

By F. A. MITCHELL

Two men about the same age—between thirty and thirty-five—met on the steps of the capitol at Washington. They were unworldly alike. Both stopped, and each fixed his eyes on the other in astonishment.

"If I were not sure, she," said one, "that I have no twin brother I would look upon you as such."

"You are certainly like me," said the other, "though immeasurably better looking. I would be glad if I possessed that eagle eye, that noble brow."

"Nonsense!" exclaimed the other. "Who are you?"

"I am Winfield Gawtry, the new member of the house of representatives from the congressional district of —"

"And I am Newland Ferguson, recently elected to the house from the —th district of —"

"Happy to meet you, Mr. Ferguson. I trust we shall be friends. I have often heard of you and the confidence your constituents repose in you. Your handling of the — canal case has made you known all over."

"And it is evident from your pulcritude that you are a smooth-tongued politician."

"Right you are, while you are a man of ponderous brain. We are each started on the political ladder. I'll wager you, Mr. Ferguson, that I reach the top round first."

"And I'll wager you that you tumble over the top round as soon as I have reached it and fall to the ground."

"Where I will find just as many fools to start me climbing again."

"Doubtless."

"Will you kindly give me your address, Mr. Ferguson? I am not such a fool as you think me. I recognize in you one upon whom we men of the people must draw on for ideas. I desire to call upon you, to make you my friend."

The address was given, and the two men became intimate. It is not true that in friendship like this to like, Mr. Ferguson rivaled the scotchman's self Gawtry for his ability to make himself attractive to the masses, and Mr. Gawtry proposed to get out of Ferguson all there was in him. One evening when they were together Mr. Ferguson heaved a deep sigh.

"That's a love sigh," said Gawtry.

"How did you guess that?"

"Love is a folly that even a brainy man may indulge in. I have observed no other nonsense about you; therefore I conclude that your sigh indicates love."

"You are right. Mine is a case of unrequited love."

"You mean that you are too intellectual, too much inclined to be always looking for the meat at the bottom of questions, too matter of fact for the lady?"

"Perhaps so."

"If I had your intrusive worth with my shyness I could win any woman in the world."

"Very likely."

"I wonder," continued Gawtry after a pause, "if such a combination could not be effected between you and me?"

"What do you mean?"

"You and I are as like in appearance as two peas in a pod. The lady you court knows your worth. How would it do for me to personate you and bring to her upon her my blandishments in your behalf?"

Ferguson looked at his friend impulsively, thoughtfully.

"Do you suppose you could fool her?" he asked.

"I could try."

"She would detect the deception in the difference in clothes."

"I could wear your clothes."

After a number of conferences it was decided to make the attempt. As soon as Gawtry had supplied deficiencies he was to coach Ferguson in how to win with a woman, and it was hoped that the latter would be able to maintain the advantage secured.

Ferguson was wearing at the time a blue suit with striped waistcoat and neckwear of a special pattern. Gawtry donned this apparel and one evening called upon Miss Agnes Buell, the lady who was to be won by this combination of worth and flattery. She came into the room with indifference in her bearing and put out her hand carelessly to her caller. To her surprise he raised it to his lips and kissed it. The lady looked up at him, surprised.

It seemed to her that her lover was slightly changed in appearance from her last meeting with him. But there were the striped waistcoat, the figured scarf.

"You see a difference in me?" said Gawtry, smiling. "I expected it. I have had my hair cut since I saw you last."

"I thought there had been some change, but I could not tell what it was."

"There is also a change in you."

"A change in me?"

"Yes. I have never seen you so happy."

"Dear me! What's come over you?"

"I'll tell you. A political deal of great importance has been absorbing my attention during the last few days."

"What is it?"

"What is it?"

"What is it?"

"What is it?"

kissed her again.

"I hope you won't get involved in any more political deals, for then you're both."

Of course he kissed her for that and, leading her to a sofa, drew her down beside him and poured forth a flood of mingled adoration and flattery that, coming from a man supposed to be usually wrapped in questions of import to his constituents, was delightful.

And to think that she was the recipient of all this; that she had won a man at once so deep and so full of sentiment! After an evening which Miss Buell thought altogether too short this combination of some and absurdly departed, leaving her in a seventh heaven.

Gawtry told Ferguson about the interview except the kisses, for he was an ardent politician and never made blunders in his handling of others. Ferguson was much interested in the report. After listening to the methods his double had used he said that he thought he could mend his ways and accomplish something of the same results. The next evening he made the experiment and failed signally.

When Miss Buell entered the room where he was awaiting her she advanced joyfully, but was at once repelled by the stern look on his face.

"Oh, my goodness gracious!" she exclaimed. "You have relapsed to your old self."

"Do tell me," he said earnestly, "how I am different from what I was when I saw you last."

"Why, you haven't kissed me yet."

"Kissed you?"

The plan was nearly spoiled by this revelation. That "basically political" character, as Ferguson called Gawtry, in thinking of him, had been kissing the lady. But Ferguson was a man of great self-control, and instead of betraying himself he bent forward and gave his ladylove a reverential kiss. This helped him out for awhile, but he soon continued to lose ground again, and in half an hour Miss Buell was sitting by him pointing. He tried to say some "soft" things to her, but they were spoken from the lips rather than from the heart and produced a contrary effect from the one intended. The consequence was that the partying was not what it should have been.

Ferguson returned to his room crestfallen. He was to have the floor of the house the next morning on a very important bill and spent several hours before going to bed in preparation for his coming effort. He had endeavored to excuse himself for his seeming coldness to Miss Buell by telling her that his mind was on his speech, and the next morning she resolved to go to the capitol to hear it.

When Ferguson took the floor there was the usual hum of conversation and business, and it continued till the speaker was half through his argument. But gradually certain influential members were attracted by what he was saying, and before he had finished the whole house was listening.

Miss Buell was much struck with this power in her lover and very proud to have won such a man, but she sighed at remembering that only once had he thrown off the statesman for the lover.

Not long after this she was in the gallery of the house again when she saw, as she thought, her Ferguson arise to speak. He was not in his usual apparel, and there was something about him not like himself.

When he began to speak there came forth a charming flow of words. The members with one accord dropped what they were doing and listened to him. Miss Buell was surprised that whereas at his previous effort he had been obliged to wait for the attention of his audience he now jumped right into it.

But as the speaker continued one by one the thinking members ceased to listen. There was the same flow of language, but to flow of ideas. When the oration was ended the hum of business there had been before was recommenced.

"Who is that man?" asked a lady sitting near Miss Buell of another.

"That's Gawtry, the great demagogue. He has an immense following among people who mistake his oratorical powers for statesmanship."

A light broke in upon Miss Buell's brain—not one light, but two. In the first place she had mistaken this man for her lover. In the second she saw the immeasurable superiority of the one over the other. There was a third light that did not pierce her brain. It did not occur to her that one of these men had played the part of the other.

She sent a message to Ferguson asking him to call the same evening. He obeyed the summons with alacrity and a new hope. As soon as they met Miss Buell said:

"There is a member of the house whom, as soon as I saw him, I mistook for you. The likeness is marvelous. I heard you speak the other day, and I noticed that you gradually gained a hearing by bringing forth ideas, while the starting with a hearing on account of a delightful flow of language, but it became ideas were wanting. I'm afraid we girls are very much like the people and their representatives. We are caught by blandishments. Fortunately, I have been disenchanted by hearing you and this man Gawtry speak. Hereafter, if you are not demonstrative I'll try not to notice it. I prefer your worth to another's flattery."

This speech gave Ferguson a confidence he had never felt before. He took the lady in his arms and kissed her rapturously.

Ferguson, in those days, the political arena. Gawtry never did. And now Ferguson's case is being tampered with the same old plan for his defeat.

Boyer City Tannery Employees Receive Bonus on Year's Work

Five Thousand Dollars Paid on Basis of Two Per Cent. for Past Year.

The Michigan Tanning and Extract Company pays its employees this month a bonus for faithful service rendered during the past year. Each employee receives a sum equal to two per cent. of the wage earned in 1915. This will come to $5000 in round numbers and will affect some three hundred men.

This is not a so-called profit-sharing plan and has not been established as permanent. However, the precedent has been set which will lead to expectation in the future. No strings are tied to the bonus money. It is simply declaring a dividend of two per cent. on wages earned the past year and will encourage the co-operation of all employees.

The logical sequence of an effort to show the employees they are looked upon as a part of the company and that the interests of the employee and the employer are the same. The Michigan Tanning and Extract Company has in many ways contributed to the betterment of the condition of its employees.

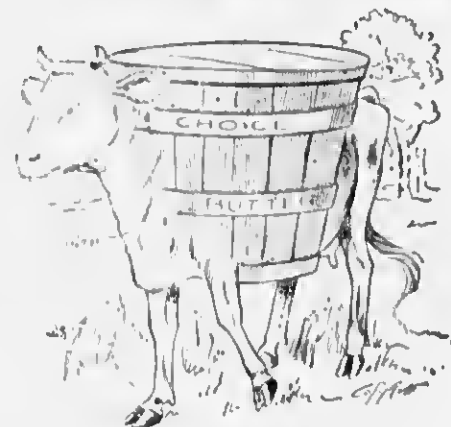

At Petoskey a night school has been inaugurated, where any employee may secure the fundamentals of an education without loss of time and at no expense. Working conditions have been improved, interest has been manifested in the social life of the workman, and now he who by faithfulness and endeavor has assisted in advancing the interests of his employers has been awarded a share of the profits accruing therefrom.—Boyer Citizen.

CHARLEVOIX EAST JORDAN

EAST JORDAN PYTHIANS

Will Build New Castle Hall—Contract Let to John Monroe to be Completed June 1.

East Jordan is to have a new Pythian Castle Hall during the coming year. The knights of that city have let the contract for this fine structure to John Monroe of that place. The hall will be modern in every respect and built to suit the requirements of this order.

A large lodge room will be constructed. In addition to this a spacious club-room will be annexed as well as a kitchen with the necessary accessories for each. The contract calls for the completion of this structure by June 1st, which when completed will be grand tribute to the city of East Jordan.

Company 1, thirty-third infantry of the Michigan National Guard will have a new armory when the remodeling of the old K. of P. hall is completed. Although the youngest company in point of service and in a smaller city than any other company in the state, Company 1 has already made a reputation for attendance and excellence in drill work. Captain Winters is largely responsible for the showing the company has made.

SYNOPSIS.

John Bellamy Smart, unmarried and heir to a fortune, while abroad with his secretary, Popenodyke, and his valet, Britton, buys a dilapidated old castle on the Danube, in the care of the Schmicks, and discovers a mysterious woman inhabiting one of the towers.

Smart fails to batter down a huge door leading to the east wing in search of the fair lady. He interrupts a visit of American relic hunters.

Thar amine attempts to buy some of the castle's ancient furniture, but to their discomfort and hurried departure, Smart catches a glimpse of his fair neighbor's waving hair.

Another visit to the mysterious east wing fails, but later the beautiful stranger strikes up an acquaintance with the new owner through a secret loophole.

Smart aids the countess to foil her husband's attempt to find his way through a secret door and tries to throw the count off the track.

Smart dines with the countess in celebration of the departure of the count and other guests and she speaks of buried treasure.

The newspapers publish statements in which Smart is made to say he upholds Count Tarnowsky in everything. Smart sends a denial.

The count invites the "fool" to lend him $50,000 for which he offers doubtful security. He shows resentment when the money is refused.

Smart is informed he is in love, an impression his secretary aids in creating by sending flowers to the countess. Bangs, a lawyer, reports to the countess.

Count Tarnowsky and a Mr. Schwartzmuller visit the castle, offering to restore ancient frescoes for $40,000. Bangs are struck, and the count draws a pistol.

The countess unfolds a plan whereby her mother, Mrs. Titus, hopes to get her safely out of the country.

Smart motors to the railroad station to meet Mrs. Titus, but she arrives with her son, Collingcraft, and Jasper, by a different route.

The mother and the boy establish themselves in the castle with the same freedom adopted by the countess. Smart, fearing detection, forbids Mrs. Titus leaving the grounds.

CHAPTER XX.

I Indulge in Plain Language.

IT TOOK them over the castle—that is, a part of the castle. Mrs. Titus would not climb stairs. She confessed to banting, but drew the line at anything more exhausting. I fear I was too pitifully relieved when she declined to go higher than the second story.

"It isn't necessary, Mr. Smart," she said sweetly, "to go into the history of the wretched Rothboefen, as a Cook's interpreter might do. You see, I know the castle quite well, and I have had all the late news from my daughter."

"Of course," I agreed. "Stupid of me not to remember that you are descended from!"

"Mother isn't half as stuck up about it as you might think, Mr. Smart," interrupted Jasper Junior glibly. "She prefers to let people think her ancestors were Dutch instead of merely German. Dutch ancestors are the proper thing in New York."

"Jangle," said his mother severely, "how often must I caution you not to speak of New York as New York. Some day you will say it to a Jew. One can't be too careful. Heaven alone knows when you are in the presence of a Jew in these days."

"Oh, I'm not 'fascinated' said I quickly. "My ancestors were Dutch. They came over with the original skin grafters."

She looked puzzled for a moment. The countess laughed. Then Jasper saw the point. Collingcraft was the big, to see it, and then it was too late for him to smile.

We had tea in the bazaar, and I dined with the family in the countess's apartment at 8 that night. I think Mrs. Titus was rather favorably impressed when she beheld me in my own right. Britton had smoothed out my evening clothes and they almost shone, and I managed to carry myself with unusual buoyancy.

Everything went very well that evening. We were all in the humor, and the dinner was an excellent one. I permitted him one unhappy blunder. I asked Mrs. Titus if she knew the Killys, Wertheimers and the Rocksworths in New York.

"Visibly," she said, succinctly, and I made haste to change the subject. The countess took it as a compliment, and Collingcraft said something about it being more than likely that we did not have any mutual acquaintances in New York. His sister came to my rescue with a very amusing and exaggerated account of my experience with the Killys, Wertheimers and Rocksworths. Jasper was enthusiastic. Something told me that I was going to like him.

My troubles began the next day, and at the rather unseasonable hour of 8 o'clock in the morning, Collingcraft came down the hall in a bath gown and slippers, hanged on my bedroom door and wanted to know why he couldn't have hot water for his bath.

He was too full-blown, and all that sort of thing, he said, to take a cold plunge. Moreover, he wasn't used to taking his bath in the up. (That was his sarcastic way of referring to my penible, badly bathed.) I asked him why he didn't ring for Britton, and he said he did, but that Britton was assisting Jasper in a wild chase for a bat which had got into the lady's room during the night.

"Thank you, lucky stars it didn't get into mother's room," he said surlily. I silently thanked them.

He made such a row about his bath that I had to give him the pall of hot water Britton had placed in my bedroom preparatory to my own bath.

At breakfast Jasper complained about the but. He couldn't for the life of him see why I didn't have screens in the windows.

Later on Mrs. Titus, who had coffee and toast in her room, joined us in the loggia and announced that the coffee was stane cold. Moreover, she did not like the guest chamber into which she had been moved by order of the countess. It was too large for a bedroom, and the iron window shutters creaked all night long.

"But you love the view you have of the Danube?" I inquired rather mournfully.

"I don't sit in the window all night, Mr. Smart," she said tartly.

I at once insisted on her resuming possession of my bedroom and promptly had all of my things moved into the one she had occupied during the night. When the countess heard of this arrangement she was most indignant. She got me off to a corner and cruelly informed me that I hadn't the vestige of a backbone. She must have said something to her mother, too, for when evening came around I had to move back into my own room. Mrs. Titus sweetly assuring me that under no consideration would she consent to impose upon my good nature and hospitality to such an extent, etc.

During the day at odd times Collingcraft made lofty suggestions in regard to what could be done with the place to make it more or less inhabitable, and Jasper—who, by the way, I was beginning to fear I should not like after all—said he'd just like to have a whack at the thing himself. First thing he'd do would be to turn some of those old, unused rooms into squash and racket courts, and he'd also put in a swimming pool and a hot water plant.

Late in the afternoon I stole far up into the eastern tower to visit my adorable friend Rosemary. We played house together on the nursery floor, and I soon got over my feeling of depression. But even in play I was made to realize that I was not the master of the house. She ruled up with the utmost despotism, but I didn't mind. She permitted me to slip home from that cunning place in her little neck and managed to call me Uncle. My heart grew warm and soft again under the spell of her.

The countess watched us at play from her seat by the window. She was strangely still and positive. I had the feeling that she was watching me all the time and that there was a shadow of anxiety in her lovely eyes. She smiled at our pranks, and yet there was something sad in the smile.

I was young again with Rosemary and full of life. She took me out of myself. I forgot the three Tituses and with them many of my woes. There was a cure for the blues this day in the kiddie of the unspeakable Tarnowsky.

I lay awake for hours that night, but when I finally went to sleep, I had known I needed it—it was with the soporific resolution to put my house right in order the very next day. The Titus family (omitting the countess and Rosemary) was to be favored with an ultimatum from which there could be no appeal. John Bellamy Smart had decided—with Rosemary's smoothing out the wrinkles of perplexity—that he would be master in his own house.

My high resolve flattered itself on a little after the sound sleep I had and I make no doubt I should have wavered early in my purpose had it not been for a crisis arisen to shape my courage for me in a rather complete way.

Shortly after breakfast Mrs. Titus came downstairs very smartly dressed for the street. She announced she was going into the town for an hour or two and asked me to take one of the Schmicks ferry her across the river. There was a famous antique shop there, memory of other days, and she wanted to browse awhile in search of trasses and bronzes.

I looked at her calmly. I recognized the crisis. But for a moment was unable to marshal my powers of resistance. Nothing my consternation, she calmly assured me that there wouldn't be the least danger of detection, as she was going to be heavily veiled and very cautious.

"My dear Mrs. Titus," I murmured in my dismay, "it isn't to be considered. I am sure you won't persist in this when I tell you that Tarnowsky's agents are sure to see you and—"

She laughed. "Tarnowsky's agents! Why should they be here?"

"They seem to be everywhere."

"I can assure you there is none within fifty miles of Schloss Rothboefen. Our men are in the city. Four of them preceded me. This morning I had Mr. Bangs telephone to the hotel where the chief operative is staying—in the guise of an American tourist, and he does it very cleverly for an Englishman too—and he assures me that there is absolutely no danger. Even Mr. Bangs is satisfied."

"I am forced to say that I am by no means satisfied that it is a safe or wise thing to do, Mrs. Titus," I said, with more firmness than I thought I possessed.

She raised her delicate eyebrows in a most exasperating, well-wired, admonitory way.

"I am quite sure, Mr. Smart, that Collingcraft is a perfectly trustworthy detective, and—"

"But why take the slightest risk?"

"It is necessary for me to see Collingcraft, that is the long and short of it," she said coldly. "One can't discuss things over a telephone, you know. Mr. Bangs understands. And, by the way, Mr. Smart, I have taken the liberty of calling up the central office of the telephone company to ask if they can run an extension wire to my dressing room. I hope you do not mind."

"Not in the least. I should have thought of it myself."

"You have so much to think of, poor man! And now will you be good enough to have flunkies order the man to row me across the river?"

"I am very sorry, Mrs. Titus," said I firmly, "but I fear I must decline my self. I cannot permit you to go into the town today."

She was thunderstruck. "Are you in earnest?" she cried after searching my face rather intently for a moment.

"Unhappily, yes. Will you let me explain?"

"The Idiot!" she exclaimed as she drew herself to her full height and withered me with a look of surpassing scorn. "Am I to regard myself as a prisoner, Mr. Smart?"

"Oh, I beg of you, Mrs. Titus," I began miserably.

"Please answer my question."

Her tone cut me like the lash of a whip. My choler rose.

"I do not choose to regard myself as a prisoner. My only object in opposing this—"

"I have never known anything so absurd," Two bright red spots appeared in her cheeks. "Your attitude is most extraordinary. However, I shall go to the city this morning. Mr. Smart. Pray give me the credit of having sense enough to— Ah, Collingcraft!"

The two sons approached from the breakfast room, where they had been enjoying a 10 o'clock chop. Collingcraft, noting his mother's attitude, accelerated his speed and was soon beside us.

"Going out, mother?" he inquired, flicking the ash from his cigarette.

"If Mr. Smart will be good enough to withdraw his opposition," she said coldly.

He gave me a sharp look. "What's up?"

"Mrs. Titus doesn't seem to realize the risk she runs in—"

"Risk? Do you suppose, Mr. Smart, I would jeopardize my daughter's?"

"What's up?" repeated Collingcraft insistently.

"Mr. Smart calmly informs me that I am not to go into the city."

"I don't see that Mr. Smart has anything to say about it," said her son coldly. "If he—"

I looked him squarely in the eye. If he had possessed the weapon of a pistol he would have seen that my lunch was up.

"One moment, Mr. Titus," I said, setting my jaw. "I have this to say about it. You are guests in my house. We are jointly interested in the effort to protect the Countess Tarnowsky. I consider it to be the height of impudence for any member of your family to venture into the city now or at any time during her stay in this castle. It happens to know that Tarnowsky is having me watched for some purpose or other."

"I don't think he suspects that the countess is here, but I seriously feel that he believes I am interested in her cause. He suspects me. You have heard of our recent encounter. He knows my position pretty well by this time. Mrs. Titus says that the man Collingcraft assures her there is no danger. Well, I can only say that Collingcraft is a fool, and I don't purpose having my own safety threatened by—"

"Your safety?" exclaimed he. "I like that! What have you got to be afraid of?"

"You seem to forget that I am harboring a fugitive from justice," I said coldly.

Mrs. Titus gasped. "How dare you?"

"The Countess Tarnowsky is wanted by the authorities for kidnapping, and I think you know the facts quite as well as I do." I went on harshly. "I know I am doing my best to protect her. I am risking more than you seem to appreciate. If she is found here my position isn't likely to be an enviable one. I am not thinking solely of myself, believe me, but after all I control that I have a right to assert myself in a crisis that may affect me vitally. I trust you will see my position and not accordingly—with constant assertion of nothing at all."

Mrs. Titus did not take her eyes off mine while I was speaking. There was an expression of utter amazement in them. No one had ever opposed her before in just this way. I gathered. She didn't know what to make of it.

"I fear you exaggerate the extent of your peril, Mr. Smart," she said dryly. "Of course I have no desire to put you in jeopardy, but it seems to me—"

"Leaving me out of this case altogether, don't you think it is a bit unfair to the countess?" I asked in some heat. "She doesn't want to go to jail."

"Jail?" she cried angrily.

"That's no way to speak about"— began Collingcraft furiously.

I broke in rashly. "If you please, Mr. Titus, be good enough to keep your temper. I have no desire to appear harsh and arbitrary, but I can see that it is necessary to speak plainly. There isn't anything in the world I will not do to help you and the countess in this unfortunate business."

Mrs. Titus. I hope you believe me when I say as much. I am her friend. I want to be yours if you will let me. But I reserve the right to say what shall be and what shall not be done as long as you are under my roof. Just a moment, Mr. Titus! I think we are quite agreed that your sister is to depart from here on the 14th of the month. I am to be her escort, and to speak for a considerable distance in company with Mr. Bangs. Well, it must be clearly understood that not one of you is to show his or her face outside these walls until after that journey is over. That's plain speaking, isn't it?"

"I shall go where I please, and I'll go to the town today,"—raved Collingcraft, getting no further for the reason that his mother, seeing that I was desperately in earnest, gave vent to a little cry of alarm and eluded her big son by the shoulder. She begged him to listen to reason.

"Reason!" he gasped.

"If you—or any of you—put a foot outside these walls," I declared, "you will not be allowed to re-enter. That's flat!"

"By cricky!" fell in fervent admiration from the lips of Jasper Junior. I glanced at his beaming, astonished face. He positively was grinning.

"Good for you! You're a wonder, Mr. Smart!" By cricky! And you're dead right! We're darn fools!"

"Jasper!" gasped Mrs. Titus.

"Good for you, Jasper!" I cried warmly and took the hand he proffered.

"Collingcraft, please take me to my room," murmured the mother. "I—I feel faint. Send for Althea. Ask Mr. Bangs to come to me at once."

I bowed stidily. "I am sorry, Mrs. Titus, to have been so harsh, so as servative."

She held up both hands. "I never was so spoken to in all my life, Mr. Smart. I shall not forget it to my dying day."

She walked away from me, her pretty head held high and her chin suspiciously aquiver. Collingcraft hastened after her, but without giving me a stare in which rage and wonder struggled for the mastery.

I ran my hand over my moist forehead. "Gee!" said Jasper Junior. "You've carked her all right, all right." He followed me into the study, and I couldn't get rid of him for hours.

CHAPTER XXI.

I Have a Tilt With Collingcraft.

LATER in the forenoon the countess, with a queer little smile on her lips, told me that her mother considered me the most wonderful, derfult, the most forceful character she had ever encountered. I brightened up at that.

But Collingcraft was not yet through with me. He sought me out just before luncheon. I was in the courtyard listening patiently to Jasper Junior's theories and suggestions concerning the restoration of the entire facade of the castle and what he'd do if he were in my place. Strange to say, I was considerably entertained; he was not at all offensive. On the contrary, he offered his ideas in a pleasantly ingenious way, always supplementing them with some such salve as "Don't you think so, Mr. Smart?" or "I'm sure you have thought of it yourself," or "Isn't that your idea too?" or "You've done wonders with the joint, old man."

Collingcraft came directly up to where we were standing.

"See here, Mr. Smart," he began earnestly. "I've got something to say to you, and I'm not the sort to put it off. I appreciate what you've done for Althea and all that sort of thing, but your manner today has been intolerable, and we've got to come to an understanding."

"If you mean closely, 'I suppose you're about to suggest that one of the other of us must evacuate—get out, so to speak,' I said."

"Don't talk rubbish. You've got my mother law'ing her eyes out upstairs and wishing she were dead. You've got to come off this high horse of yours. You've got to apologize to her, and quick at that. Understand?"

"Nothing will give me greater joy than to offer her my most ardent apologies. Mr. Titus, unless it would be her unqualified forgiveness."

"You'll have to withdraw everything you said."

"I'll withdraw everything except my ultimatum in respect to her putting a foot outside these walls. That still stands."

"I beg to differ with you."

"You may beg if you're black in the face," said I coolly.

"He swallowed hard. His face twisted, and his hands were clenched.

"You are pretty much of a punk, Mr. Smart," he said between his teeth. "I'm sorry my sister has fallen into your hands. The worst of it is she seems satisfied with everything you do. Good Lord, what she can see in you is beyond comprehension. Promise me, why don't you withdraw your ultimatum?"

TEMPERANCE NOTES

LICENSE—HIGH TO HIGHEST.

In Massachusetts the minimum cost of a first class saloon license is $1,000. The maximum is not fixed by law, but there are instances on record where licenses have sold for $7,500 and $10,000. The average price is about $3,500.

How does it work—this license system raised to its highest power? The New York Commercial—certainly not a dry advocate—speaking of the increase of the license fee in the state of New York from $1,200 to $1,500 a year, says:

"It seems plausible to reduce the number of drinking places and raise their status by imposing heavy license fees, but in practice it results in turning over the business to a few brewers who are able to finance the license fees and to drive independent dealers out of business. In some cities in Massachusetts brewers and wholesale dealers control practically all the saloons and hotels and form syndicates to handle the monopoly so given to them by the high license law. It would be easy to form a syndicate in New York city that would pay $10,000 a year for each license taken out. The revenue might be increased by giving such a monopoly, but the liquor business would be run for 'all there was in it,' and social conditions would not be improved. Massachusetts has given high license a fair test and the results are not what its original advocates promised."

ALCOHOL AND INSANITY.

"The seeming indifference of the public and the authorities appears incomprehensible when it is considered that havoc is wrought by alcohol. We spend millions of dollars annually to stamp out and protect the public from infectious diseases, yet the harm done by alcohol is infinitely greater than that caused by all the infectious diseases put together. In our annual admissions to Bellevue hospital of over 3,000 patients (in the wards for mental diseases) more than ten per cent were suffering from insanity due directly to alcohol, and in more than forty per cent alcohol had played a most important part in the causation of the insanity. It seems to me that it would be the greatest aid to humanity if measures might be taken to reduce the consumption of this poison to a minimum, and to provide proper curative institutions for those who have formed a habit but have not passed the curative stage into one of complete mental and physical degeneration. Such an institution should be maintained as well as educational. In such institutions many will find recovery, while, for those who do not, proper restrictions will prevent their leading a life of crime."—Dr. M. S. Gregory of Bellevue Hospital, New York.

FIVE REASONS.

Dr. Henry Williams of New York, an eminent specialist in nervous and mental diseases, has summed up his investigation concerning alcohol in these words:

"I am bound to believe, on the evidence, that if you take alcohol habitually in any quantity whatever, it is to some extent a menace to you. If you do this, I am bound to believe in the light of what science has revealed:

"1. That you are largely threatening the physical structure of your stomach, your liver and kidneys, your heart, your blood vessels, your nerves, and brain;

"2. That you are unequivocally decreasing your capacity for working in any field, be it physical, intellectual, or artistic;

"3. That you are in some measure lowering the grade of your mind, dulling your higher esthetic sense, and taking the finer edge off your morals;

"4. That you are distinctly lessening your chances for maintaining health and attaining long life; and,

"5. That you are entailing upon your descendants yet unborn a bond of incalculable misery."

DRINK AND ACCIDENTS.

The following report was sent by the Bessemer & Lake Erie Railroad company to the interstate commerce commission:

Average number of employees February 5, 1915, to September 1, 1915, 3,330

Average number Water Wagon Club members February 15 to September 1, 1915, 1,500

Total number accidents causing employees to lose three or more days' time, 224

Number of the 22 employees injured who are members of the club, 43

Percentage of total number of members injured, 6.82

Percentage of men injured who are not club members, 8.93

Percentage of total club members to total number injured, 19.19

TOTAL ABSTINENCE ADVANCE.

Total abstinence is no longer a ridiculed fanaticism. It sits in regal state on the throne of empires and of kingdoms, and in republics sways, in ever-increasing measure, the voting citizenship. It safeguards the soldier, the aviator and the crew of the submarine. It gives a clear brain in the railroad man, the athlete, the autoist and the commercial, industrial and agricultural worker. It says: "The first man to be taken off is the man who drinks."—Anna A. Gordon.

LEGAL NOTICES

Mortgage Foreclosure Sale.

Default having been made in the performance of the conditions of a certain real estate mortgage executed and delivered by William H. Santos and Rosa C. Santos, his wife, dated May 20, A. D. 1914, and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds of Charlevoix County, Michigan, May 23, A. D. 1915, in Liber 25 of Mortgages on page 444, by reason of which default the power of sale in said mortgage contained has become operative, and there is claimed to be due at the date of this notice of principal and interest the sum of Six Hundred Twenty-five and 6/100 Dollars ($625.60), and no proceedings at law or in equity having been instituted to collect said amount or any part thereof, and the same being now due and payable, and the tax required by statute having been paid on said mortgage prior to the recording thereof and on 20th day of May, 1915, said mortgage will be foreclosed by a statutory sale of the premises therein described, or so much thereof as may be necessary to satisfy the amount then due thereon of principal and interest, together with the costs and expenses of this foreclosure, including the attorney fee of Twenty-five Dollars ($25.00) provided for therein, at public auction in the highest bidder on the 22nd day of April, A. D. 1916, at the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoon at said day at the east front door of the Court House in the City of Charlevoix, County of Charlevoix, State of Michigan, the being the place where the Circuit Court for the County of Charlevoix is held. The premises to be sold under this foreclosure are described in said mortgage as follows: The East Half (1/2) of the Southwest Quarter (1/4) of Section Nineteen (19), Township Thirty-three (33) North, Range Eight (8) West, Norwood Township, Charlevoix County, Michigan.

Dated at Charlevoix, Michigan, January 28, 1916.

Elizabeth Tullock Mortgagor, R. W. Kane, Attorney for Mortgagor, Charlevoix, Michigan. 413

Mortgage Sale.

Default having been made in the conditions of a certain mortgage made by Solon Ward and Lizzie Ward (husband and wife and joint owners), of Bayview, Michigan, to the Capital Savings and Loan Association of Lansing, Michigan, dated the 24th day of August, A. D. 1912, and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds for the County of Charlevoix and State of Michigan, on the 17th day of October, A. D. 1913, in Liber 46 of mortgages, on page 28, and containing a power of sale, on which mortgage there is claimed to be due at the date of this notice, December 15th, 1915, the sum of Three Hundred Twenty-Six and 34/100 ($326.34) Dollars, and an attorney's fee of Fifteen (15) Dollars, as provided by law, and no suit or proceedings at law having been instituted to recover the money secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

Notice is hereby given, that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and the statute in such case made and provided, on the ninth day of March, A. D. 1916, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, the undersigned

By George Barr McCutcheon

from the assault of a chicken?"

"Are you trying to insult me, Mr. Titus?"

"You couldn't resent it if I were. There never was an author with enough moral backbone to—"

"Wait! You are her brother. I don't want to have trouble with you. But if you keep on in this strain, Mr. Titus, I shall be compelled to thrash you soundly."

He fairly gasped. "Th—thrash me!" he choked out. Then he advanced.

Much to his surprise—and, strangely enough, not to my own—I failed to retreat. Instinctively I extended my left fist with considerable abruptness and precision, and he landed on his back.

I experienced a sensation of unholy joy. Up to that moment I had wondered whether I could do it with my left hand.

I looked at Jasper Junior. He was staring at me in utter bewilderment.

"Good Lord, you—you've knocked him down!"

"I didn't think I could do it," said I hazily.

He sprang to his brother's side and assisted him to a sitting posture.

"Tight to the jaw," shouted Jasper, with a strange enthusiasm.

"Left," I corrected him.

Collingraft gazed about him in a stupid, vacant fashion for a moment, and then allowed his glazed eyes to rest upon me. He sat rather limply, I thought.

"Are you hurt, Colly?" cried Jasper Junior.

"A sickly grin, more of surprise than shame, stole over Collingraft's face. He put his hand to his jaw, then to the back of his head.

"By Jove!" he murmured. "I—didn't think he had it in him. Let me get up!"

Jasper Junior was discreet. "Better let well enough alone, old—"

"I intend to," said Collingraft as he struggled to his feet.

For a moment he faced me uncertainly.

"I'm sorry, Mr. Titus," said I calmly.

"You—you are a wonder!" fell from his lips. "I'm not a coward, Mr. Smart. I've boxed a good deal in my time, but by Jove, I never had a jolt like that!"

He turned abruptly and left us. We followed him slowly toward the steps. At the bottom he stopped and faced me again.

"You're a better man than I thought," he said. "If you'll hurry the hatchet, so will I. I take back what I said to you not because I'm afraid of you, but because I respect you. What say? Will you shake hands?"

The sorry, arrogant expression was gone from his face. In its place was a puzzled, somewhat imploring look.

"No hard feeling on my part," I cried gladly. We shook hands. Jasper Junior slapped me on the back. "It's a most distressing, nasty habit I'm getting into, knocking people down without rhyme or reason."

"I daresay you had reason," muttered Collingraft. "I got what was coming to me." An eager light crept into his handsome eyes. "By Jove, we can get in some corking work with the gloves while I'm here. I box quite a bit at home, and I miss it traveling about like this. What say to a half hour or so every day? I have the gloves in one of my trunks. I'm getting this horribly seedy. I need stirring up."

"Charmed, I'm sure," I said, assuming an enthusiasm I did not feel. I put on the gloves with this strange, skilful boxer? Not I; I was firmly resolved to stop while my record was good. In a scientific clash with the gloves he would soon find out what a miserable duffer I was.

"And Jappy, here, is no slouch. He's as shifty as the dickens."

"The shifter to it, ter," said I with great aplomb. Jasper Junior stuck out his chest modestly and said, "Oh, Mr. Titus, Colly, you just the same I hadn't the least doubt in my mind that Jasper could 'put it all over me.' It was a rather sickening admission, though strictly private.

We made our way to my study, where I mildly suggested that we refrain from mentioning our little encounter to Mrs. Titus or the countess. I thought Collingraft was especially pleased with the idea. We swore secrecy.

"I've always been regarded as a peaceful, harmless grub," I explained, still somewhat bewildered by the feat. I had performed and considerably shaken by the fear that I was degenerating into a positive ruffian. "You will believe me, I hope, when I declare that I was merely acting in self defense when I—"

He actually laughed. "Don't apologise," he could not resist the impulse to blurt out once more. "By Jove, I didn't think you could do it."

"With my left hand, too," I said wonderingly. Catching myself up, I hastily changed the subject.

A little later on as Collingraft left the room, shyly feeling of his jaw, Jasper Junior whispered to me excitedly, "You've got him eating out of your hand, old top."

"Things were coming to a pretty pass," said I to myself when I was all alone. It certainly is a pretty pass when one knocks down the ex-husband and the brother of the woman he loves and quite without the least suspicion of an inherited pugacity.

I had a little note from the countess that afternoon, ceremoniously delivered by Helene Marie Louise Antollette.

It read as follows: "You did Collingraft a very good turn when you laid him low this morning. He is tremendously interested in his prowess as a boxer or a boxer, or whatever it is in athletic parlance. He has been like a lamb all afternoon, and he really can't get over the way you whacked him. (Is whack the word?) At first he was as mumbly as could be about it, but I think he really felt relieved when I told him I had seen the whole affair from a window in my hall. You see, it gave him a chance to explain how you got in the whack, and I have been obliged to listen to intermittent lectures on the many art of self defense all afternoon, first from him, then from Jappy. I have a head-ache and no means of defense. He admits that he deserved it, but I am not surprised. Colly is a sporting chap. He hasn't a mean drop of blood in his body. You have made a friend of him. So please don't feel that I hold a grudge against you for what you did. The funny part of it all is that mamma quite agrees with him. She says he deserved it! Mamma is wonderful, really, when it comes to a pinch. She has given up all thought of 'putting a foot outside the castle.'"

Would it be too much trouble if we were to have it in the logs? I am just mad to get out of doors if only for an hour or two in that walled-in spot. Mr. Poopen-dyke has been perfectly lovely. He came up this morning to tell me that you have not sneezed at all and there isn't the remotest chance now that you will have a cold. It seems he was afraid you might. You must have a very rugged constitution. Britton told Blake that most men would have died from exposure if they had been put in your place. How good you are to me. ALINE T.

P. S.—I may come down to see you this evening.

I shall skip over the rather uninteresting events of the next two or three days. Nothing of consequence happened unless you are willing to consider important two perfectly blissful nights of sleep on my part; also I had the pleasure of taking the countess "out walking" in my courtyard, to use a colloquialism, once in the warm, sweet sunshine, again "neath the glow of a radiant moon. She had not been outside the castle walls literally in more than five weeks, and the color leaped back into her cheeks with a rush that delighted me. I may mention in passing that I paid particular attention to her suggestion concerning my dimpled garden, to seed garden, although I had been bored to extinction by Jasper Junior when he undertook to enlighten me horticulturally. She agreed to come forth every day and assist me in building the poor thing up, propelling it, so to speak.

As for Mrs. Titus, that really engaging lady made life so easy for me that I wondered why I had ever been apprehensive. She was quite wonderful when "it came to a pinch." I began to understand a good many things about her, chief among them being her unvoiced theories on matrimony. While she did not actually commit herself, I had no difficulty in ascertaining that from her point of view, marriages are not made in heaven and that a proper, by arranged divorce is a great deal less terrestrial than it is commonly supposed to be. She believed in matrimony as a trial and divorce as a reward, or something to that effect.

My opinion seemed to carry considerable weight with her. For a day or two after our somewhat sanguinary encounter she was prone to start, even to jump slightly, when I addressed myself to her with unintentional directness. She soon got over that, however.

We were discussing Althea's unfortunate venture into the state of matrimony, and I, feeling temporarily ingenuous and superior, managed to say the wrong thing and in doing so put myself in a position from which I could not recede without loss of dignity. If my memory serves me correctly I remarked with some asperity that marriage was of that kind never turned out well for any one except the bridegroom.

She looked at me coldly. "I am afraid, Mr. Smart, that you have been putting some very bad notions into my daughter's head," she said.

"Bad notions?" I murmured.

"She has developed certain pronounced and rather extraordinary views concerning the nobility as the result of your—ah—argument, I may say."

"I'm very sorry. I know one or two exceedingly nice noblemen, and I've no doubt there are a great many more. She must have misunderstood me, I

Most gossips have a keen sense of rumor.

L. S. See made a short business trip to Ellsworth on Friday last.

Miss Lillian Emrey spent the week end in Petoskey, the guest of Mrs. Glenn Ellis.

Will Seymour was in Traverse City Friday and Saturday of last week on business.

Pitch R. Williams of East Jordan attended the opening of court the first of the week.

Dwight H. Fitch of East Jordan was in the city the first of the week on circuit court affairs.

George Hamilton is confined to his home by a severe attack of asthma brought on by the gripple.

Mike McCann of Warren, North Dakota, is here visiting his brother, Jim McCann, and his niece, Mrs. Ed. Eagleton.

Judge F. H. Mayne returned Friday evening from Traverse City, where he had been holding court during the past week.

Mrs. R. M. McKeel is confined to her home suffering from a cracked rib, the result of a fall on the icy walks received last week.

W. P. Fanning returned Friday of last week from a two weeks visit among friends and relatives at Grand Rapids, Ionia and Saginaw.

The Carpenters Union will have supper after the regular meeting on Thursday evening, February 10, at I. O. O. F. hall. All members are requested to be present.

"The Circus Man," made into a motion picture production from George Barr McCutcheon's novel, "The Rose in the Ring" at the Majestic Theatre Friday night of this week.

The members of the Congregational Sunday School are to have a potluck supper in the church dining room Friday evening, February 11th, at 6 o'clock. Parents are invited to accompany their children.

Frances Milner was hostess of her little friends and playmates on Saturday, last, the occasion being her seventh birthday. Refreshments and games made the afternoon a most enjoyable one for the little people.

A. J. Hamilton was badly burned about the face last Thursday, when a gasoline jet exploded, the flames striking him in the face. It is said that the glasses he was wearing undoubtedly saved his eyesight.

Monday and Tuesday's heavy fall of snow is causing considerable hardship to the rural carriers and those engaged in teaming. In some places the roads are badly drifted and cuts filled to the depth of from six to eight feet.

The report comes from South Manitou Island that Nels Palmer, formerly a member of the Charlevoix Coast Station, had successfully passed the examination and is now a captain in the service, with his location on the South Manitou Island.

Reuben A. Geer and Charles Munyon have the contract for putting up the coming season's supply of ice for the Charlevoix Summer Home Association and Harry Wickliffe. In Pine Lake ice is between six and eight inches in thickness now and making fast and within a short time the annual ice harvest will commence.

Winfield Emrey celebrated his fifth birthday Tuesday, by inviting a number of his little playmates to spend the afternoon with him. A number were present and the distribution of the birthday cake will be an occasion long to be remembered. The little guests left their host numerous remembrances.

Nine couples, friends of the Misses Ferguson of Norwood, who are attending the Charlevoix public schools, drove to their home Saturday afternoon. The balance of the day was spent in visiting and playing games. Delightful refreshment were served at supper time, the long sleigh ride having the effect of greatly increasing the appetite of several members of the party.

The citizens of Petoskey are jubilant of the fact that the G. R. & I. railroad will improve present train conditions. A few weeks ago both night trains were taken off. Commencing with February 14, these former night trains will be resumed, changes being made in the schedule below Cadillac. This will allow people from here going south, to take the 11:45 as usual, and returning, arrive in Petoskey at 6:00 a. m.

STATE REPORTS WRONG

Illegal Stock Sales Made By Persons Not Identified With Company.

The affairs of the Charlevoix Rock Product Company have received considerable airing in the state papers for the past ten days, concerning some crooked work committed by former company promoters.

In the Kalamazoo case, in which Mrs. Emma M. Mowery brought suit to recover $2000 from Harry E. Hunt, one of the star actors in the million dollar corporation, Maude M. Gilbert and T. P. Langway, evidence was brought out that the deal was made while the Charlevoix Rock Product Company was insolvent, and, as we understand, made in direct violation to order of the court. The case was won by Mrs. Mowery, she being awarded the amount sued for with costs.

Practically all manipulations of stock which has brought the Rock Product Company of this city before the eyes of the public have been made by persons not identified with the company since 1912. Other suits about the state are now in progress, which will result in similar verdicts.

The net is gradually growing tighter around the company's stock manipulators, and it's hoped that after undergoing a complete house-cleaning the company will be able to continue to develop its Charlevoix holdings. The publicity given Charlevoix is to be regretted, being greatly detrimental to business, not only to the city itself, but to its merchants.

Special Evangelistic Services.

Commencing with Thursday, February seventeenth, and continuing until about April fifteenth, an evangelistic campaign will be conducted in the Baptist church by the pastor, Rev. L. C. Vinyard. Rev. W. T. Roberts of Escanaba and other noted evangelists will assist during the meetings. The services of the famous Guy Irving Waltz of Lincoln, Nebraska, who is now engaged with meetings in Boston, Massachusetts, have been engaged.

SAVING AN OLD ROOF.

Oak Trusses of Ancient London Hall to Be Re-enforced by Steel.

The roof of Westminster hall, London, is supported on thirteen oak trusses, said to be the earliest and best known example of the hammer beam type, says the Engineering Record. The trusses have been in service more than 500 years without receiving other repairs than those required by the decay of the material. They are of a complicated design, with intermediate cross-braces, and have been re-enforced with modern timber struts and the bolts.

A recent investigation showed that some of the timber was so rotten and disintegrated that large pieces could be picked out and that the ravages of insects, particularly a certain species of beetle, were much more serious than dry rot and surface decay. At least four of the thirteen trusses were in a dangerous condition and likely to fall.

A plan submitted for the preservation of the roof at an estimated cost of about $200,000 has been accepted. The old trusses will be re-enforced on the lines of their principal members by steel frameworks, which will be entirely concealed. The original appearance of the building will be restored and maintained, and all large cavities in the timber will be pieced up with new oak. The trusses are in such a serious condition that they must not be lifted nor jacked in any way, but must be maintained also in their present positions with out wedging or drawing together. Some of the joints are so decayed that the roof would be likely to collapse if any attempt were made to lift and carry it by the trusses. In order to accomplish the gradual removal and reconstruction the work will be carried on from a movable steel scaffold weighing 115 tons that will support from two to four trusses simultaneously.

PEAT POWDER AS FUEL.

Successfully Used in Locomotives on Swedish Railway.

Owing to the fact that Sweden has enormous peat deposits many attempts have been made during the last few years to invent and develop devices for utilizing these deposits. Many experiments have been made in stoking stationary engines, and the results have apparently been satisfactory. Quite recently experiments have been made in stoking railway engines, and it is claimed that these efforts have also been crowned with success.

The heating power of Swedish peat is such that 1.8 tons of dried peat are equivalent to one ton of English steam coal. A young Swedish engineer has been conducting the experiments with railway engines under official control. With a device invented by himself he has made trial stokings with pulverized peat on one of the state railway engines with coal and peat simultaneously and has even under 1.3 tons of peat do the work of one ton of coal. The fuel economy achieved in these experiments is explained by the fact that less air is necessary in the combustion of pulverized peat than in stoking with dried peat.

As a result of these tests peat powder stoking has been introduced on the Helsingborg-Nassjo railroad and the Katmar railroad, besides which the Swedish state railways have procured a trial railway engine for peat powder stoking. The Finnish government railways are now constructing four railway engines to be stoked in this manner. Consular Report.

Rejuvenating a Building.

In a mill building in Minneapolis 17 feet long, 105 feet wide and six stories high dry rot in the wooden columns and walls shaken twenty-two inches out of plumb by the vibration of the machinery made it imperative that something be done. Without shutting the mill down for a single day the wooden columns were replaced with steel, the walls were re-enforced with concrete masonry several inches thick, and the wall most damaged was further braced on the outside with a framework of eight re-enforced concrete buttresses carried down to bed rock. The building is now considered stronger than when new. Engineering Record.

When Sailors Wore Petticoats.

Very few people realize that there was a day when petticoats were worn by soldiers and sailors on board ships of war. In the days before the royal navies were regularly established as a separate corps the foot regiments of the line used to take it in turns to serve us marines on shipboard. Petticoats were quite commonly worn in the navy in Nelson's time, having been in vogue there since the days of Queen Elizabeth, and the soldiers, being suddenly called upon to do the work of sailors, naturally adopted their dress finding it no doubt far handier and more convenient than their own tight fitting, froged and braided uniforms. TWO TICKETS IN SPRING PRIMARY Candidates in Both Republican and Democratic Party Have Filed.

Council Rooms in Carnegie Library Building Only Polling Place in City This Year.

When the closing hour came today for candidates to file their petitions for the various city offices to be filled this spring, it was found that both the Republican and Democratic parties were represented.

Two well-known citizens will make the run for the office of mayor on the Republican ticket and one on the Democratic. Two names also appear on the Republican ticket for the offices of clerk, treasurer, supervisor in the second ward and alderman in the third. Among some of these a red-hot fight is looked for.

This year instead of standing the expense of conducting three polling places, one in each ward, there will be but one, located in the council rooms in the Carnegie library building. This will simplify matters a great deal and also be quite a saving in the city's election expenses.

Following are the names as filed for the various offices to be filled on both Republican and Democratic tickets:

City Republican Ticket
For Mayor—George W. Priest, Andy Ross.

For Clerk—Charles Emery, Archie Livingston.

For Treasurer—Simon M. Rose, who has pledged to appoint John Cook as deputy; Alonzo Hanshaw.

First Ward
Supervisor—F. J. Meech.
Alderman—R. W. Paddock, Frank A. Hull.

Second Ward
Supervisor—Charles J. Zeitler, Jason L. Price.

Alderman—Ernest J. Hiller.

Third Ward
Supervisor—Harrison Berdan,
Alderman—Charles Carey, Lyman E. Benton.

Not to be outdone by their Republican brothers, Charlevoix's few remaining Democrats, after diligently searching the brush for members of the party affected with the "office bug," have named the following men on a ticket, which in a manner shows there is a "final squeak" left among the old guard:

City Democratic Ticket
For Mayor—Capt. William Finucan.
For Clerk—Joseph Howard.

First Ward
Supervisor—Patsy Planighan, Alderman—(Candidate wanted.)

Second Ward
Supervisor—(Watching waiting.)
Alderman—Frank M. Harris.

Third Ward
Supervisor—Alonzo Powers, Alderman—W. H. Miller.

Defeated Ellsworth.

The Eagle Patrol defeated Ellsworth at basketball at the rink Tuesday night by the close score of 23 to 21. The first half ended 13 to 7, with Charlevoix in the lead, but during the second half Ellsworth started out with a rush, nearly defeating Charlevoix. Cartier threw 8 out of 10 fouls. Those playing were: Cartier, Krulik, Humpton, Switzer and Weed. The Ellsworth boys played a good, clean game.

D. E. Clow went to Traverse City on business Friday and also took in the basketball game between the Olympics of that place and the Charlevoix Independents, which resulted in a score of 79 to 33 for Traverse City.

George Hunter, our local druggist, was unable to drive over from East Jordan where he was over Sunday, so he had to take the train and arrived here two and one-half hours late on account of the train having such a hard time getting from Traverse City here.

Mrs. Hannah Stephan, formerly of this place, died Friday at the home of her son in Lansing. The funeral was held Monday at East Jordan and interment made at the cemetery at the place. Deceased was 64 years old at the time of her death, and had lived near Ellsworth for many years and will be greatly missed by her many relatives and friends.

Political Announcement.

I hereby announce my candidacy for Judge of Probate on the Republican ticket for Antrim county and respectfully ask your consideration and vote at the coming primary for another term in this important office. I have no apologies to offer. I have tried and believe have given a good clean business administration of affairs in this office. I thank you all for many favors shown me in the past and will try and merit them in the future.

Very truly yours,

Ernest R. Harris.

Mrs. L. Palmer is again very ill.

Clarence LaLoade is now at home.

Minnie and Mary Cincush spent Sunday at Cooks'.

Mr. and Mrs. Cincush were at Frank Addis's Sunday.

Marie Barns, Mildred Illiges and Boyd Slack visited at Shermans' Sunday.

L. C. Fowler was in East Jordan on Friday and in Ellsworth on Saturday. He hauled a large load of wood on each occasion.

Most of the camps are again working full force. However, the camp run by William Taylor, about a mile north of Miles school, is short of men. Mr. LaClair stated Monday morning that they had in this camp about 200 cords of wood and 100,000 feet of logs to be taken out. They are badly in need of ten teams and several men. Good wages will be paid, as the foreman is anxious to finish the job before we lose the snow.

LOCALS LOSE BOTH GAMES

Friday a Hoo-doo Day for Ellsworth Basketball Teams.

Home Team Swears Vengeance When Return Game is Played—Girls lose 33 to 3.

Friday evening of last week the Ellsworth basketball team went to Central Lake to meet the Independent team of that place. The game was played in an old church, with the playing space so limited that no team work could be used and the game resolved into a rough and tumble contest, with the Ellsworth boys playing both the Central Lake team and the referee, with the consequence that the game was lost by a score of 24 to 20. We are looking forward to meeting this team on our home floor, when with a fair show we expect to come out victors by a good margin.

The Ellsworth girls basketball team met the Central Lake high school team Friday evening at Central Lake and were beaten by a 33 to 3 score. The girls did finely, however, when you take into consideration that with the exception of a couple of players they never played in a real game before. They speak very highly of the treatment they received from the players and coach of the Central Lake team.

The younger boys of this place went to Charlevoix Tuesday night to play the Boy Scout team of that place. They lost by a score of 23 to 21.

Grange will be held next Saturday at 2:00 p. m. instead of Tuesday. In this way Pomona and regular grange will not conflict.

Miss Edna Jolliffe was a visitor at the grange last Tuesday, February 7. In the last meeting nearly all the new officers were installed. The next meeting will be under control of the new staff of officers. Many were absent from grange at the last meeting, there being only 21 present.

Pomona grange will meet at Ellsworth in the Blue Hall, Wednesday, February 16, for one day session. In the evening there will be an open meeting and a program to which everybody is invited among the speakers will be Hon. T. D. Meggison and C. E. Denmore. After the program every granger is invited to take the fifth degree. Every one be out because we need a good fifth degree team.

DAIRY and CREAMERY

NEED OF COW TESTING.

Farmer Cannot Afford to Keep Animals That Do Not Yield Profit.

With the constantly increasing cost of production of today the farmer must know what his business costs him as well as his gross returns, says Harold's Dairyman.

The necessity of testing cows for their production is shown by the following figures, taken from various agricultural publications:

In herd A three cows produced milk at a profit of $10.55, while the remaining seven cows in the herd produced milk at a loss of $52.70, a net loss of $12.22 per cow for the herd. If the owner of these cows had sold or given away the seven poor cows he would have made a profit and saved the cost of labor as well. In herd B twelve cows yielded $456.40 profit, an average of $38.04 per head. Owner A guessed at his work and results; owner B tested each cow for milk and butter fat production.

In two Iowa test associations the best cow yielded a net profit of $106.77, the poorest cow a loss of $19.14. The 100 best cows in one association produced

I have experimented side by side with other dairy breeds and know the Jersey will produce better milk for less cost than any other breed, writes a Jersey breeder in the Rural New Yorker. Not only that, but Jersey skim milk will produce better results fed to pigs and poultry because the solids other than fat have a percentage of 7 to 10 per cent. The cow shown in a pure bred Jersey.

280.2 pounds of fat per cow at a profit of $30.02, the 100 poorest cows produced 168.4 pounds of fat per cow at $21.85 profit. The feed cost for the best cows was only $7.49 greater than for the poorest cows.

In an Illinois test, the best fourth of the cows averaged 301 pounds of fat at $31.32 profit, the poorest fourth 133.5 pounds of fat at less than 77 cents profit per cow. Twenty-five of the better cows would have yielded a profit of $783 per year, while 1,021 of the poorer cows would be required to produce the same profit.

Such results are more than enough to show the uncertainty of dairying without accurate knowledge of what each member of the herd is doing. The farmer cannot afford to keep any cows in his herd that do not produce enough to yield a profit even though the herd as a whole is profitable.

Cow testing associations are doing much to interest the dairy farmer in the business end of his work. The first cow testing association was organized in Denmark in 1895. The spread of the work there was quite rapid, while but little attention was given it in this country. During the last few years the interest here has become much more general and a considerable number of cow testing associations have been or are now being organized.

ENGLISH DAIRY TESTS.

Milking Shorthorns Score Victory Over Competing Breeds.

Returns from the dairy tests carried on at the recent English royal show have not established real show that the Shorthorns have scored another sweeping victory over all breeds competing.

The prizes in the milking trials at this show are awarded by a scale of points which allows one point for each pound of milk given, four points for every 1 per cent of fat and one point for each ten days of lactation period after the first forty days.

Scored thus, Lord Lucas' pedigreed Shorthorn cow Charity XXIII, came first of the ninety-six competing, giving sixty-eight pounds of milk testing 3.95 per cent butter fat—a total of $3.80 points. Taking part in the trials were, besides the Shorthorns, the Lincoln Reds, Devons, South Devons, Longhorns, Red Polls, Ayrshires, Holsteins, Jerseys, Guernseys, Kermies and Dexters. Lord Lucas' Primrose Gift came second with 80.85 points, and Captain Willis' Duchess of Cranford III, was third with 79.02 points. The first prize among the Lincoln Red Shorthorns went to a cow that scored 81.85 points. Five cows were credited with totals of 80 points or better and of these the Shorthorns furnished two and the Lincoln Reds one. The others were Red Polls.

BROOK TROUT.

Science Outdoor Nature In Raising the Young Fish.

The brook trout is a nest builder, but does not belong to the group of fish which cures for its eggs and young. When the function of egg laying is completed and the nest covered with gravel the parent fish seem to feel that their whole duty has been performed, and they depart, leaving both eggs and the young when they are hatched to the care of nature, and nature, it must be confessed, is generally neglectful of her charge.

Early in autumn the mature brook trout in pairs seek the gravelly bottoms of streams and spring runs. Here with nose and fins they hollow out a shallow basin and make it scrupulously clean. This is their nest, and over the bottom the eggs are scattered, covered with gravel, and their duty to posterity is ended.

Only a small proportion of the eggs deposited naturally are fertilized, and many of these are destroyed by spawn eating fishes. Most of the tiny fish which do develop and succeed in pushing a hole through the egg shell with their little tails and emerging into a watery world do so only to find quick lodgment in some larger fish.

As a foster parent the trout is a greater success than Dime Nature. The latter, under the most favorable circumstances, rarely succeeds in hatching more than 10 per cent of the eggs deposited, while the former expects to develop into wiggling fishes nearly 50 per cent of the eggs deposited.

PERFUME OF MUSK.

The Odor Is Penetrating Because the Substance Is Radio-active.

The extraordinarily penetrating power of musk perfume is accounted for by the fact that it is radio-active. The United States consul at Chungking, China, writes that this property causes the odor to be carried through the air in a way that would otherwise be impossible. And he adds that this radio-active property "affects most peculiarly the natives who carry it. If it is held close to the body for any length of time it produces sores that are probably similar in character to those caused by pure radium."

Musk is a secretion of certain glands or pouches of the male musk deer and is secreted only during certain seasons of the year. It is difficult to obtain pure, and one of the largest French manufacturers of perfume keeps a representative at Tachienlu, near the Tibetan border, for the sole purpose of buying it.

Three thousand pounds of musk on an average are shipped every year from Chungking, and fully half of this has passed through Tachienlu, which is one of the principal musk markets of the world, though eighteen days' journey from Chungking, the nearest port.

The deer, which are seldom more than three feet long and twenty to twenty-two inches tall, are being slaughtered in such numbers that they are becoming more and more scarce and will eventually be extinct.

That Genius Whistler.

Of Whistler Lady St. Heller in "Memories of Fifty Years" writes thus: "He was a genius and had all the defects and qualities of one. To him everything was a joke, the subject of a bouquet. The lightest and daintiest of persiflage was what he excelled in, and one never had a dull moment in his company. He was always late for dinner, arranging the humorous look of gray hair in his proper place as he came into the room, with apologies and excuses, none of them true, of which he was perfectly conscious and also that they were not believed. Wherever he was there would be a circle listening to him, and his ringing laugh would be heard all over the room as he sent his shafts right and left into the joints of the armor of those who were attacking him. It was a great surprise and almost a shock when he appeared as a bearded."

The Colossus of Rhodes.

The remains of the Colossus of Rhodes have been dispersed beyond possibility of recovery or even of tracing. It stood for little more than half a century and then, in 224 B. C., was overthrown by an earthquake. The Rhodians raised from benevolent outsiders large sums of money for its restoration, but divided the fund among themselves, asserting that the oracle of Delphi had forbidden them to set it up again. So there the ruin lay until 672 A. D., when the Saracens sold it to a Jewish merchant, who loaded 900 camels and went away—literally—with the brass.—London Spectator.

A Cruel Comparison. "I don't make much," said the fond suitor. "My salary is $30 a week. Could we live on that, dear?" "Ah," sighed the maiden dreamily. "Just the price of a tire for father's motorcar."

Then something told the f. a. that he was wasting time.—Birmingham Age-Herald.

Engaged.

Stranger (inquisitively)—Say, isn't that newspaper to be had yet? I've been waiting for it for two hours. Waitress—I'll see about it. Farmer Cross has it in the side room. He's teaching his little boy to read.—Ellegende Blatter. Munch.

And So It Is.

"What do you consider the greatest human paradox?" A secret session of a woman's club.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Primary Notes

The fourth grade had examinations last week.

The lower grades have been dramatizing February plays.

Dena Petter was perfect in Arithmetic every day last week.

The third grade wrote some very good rabbit stories last week.

The picture of "The Boston Tea Party" and "Our Country" were drawn on the board this week.

The per cent of attendance for the past month was the least that we have had so far this year. This is due to so much sickness among the pupils.

Grammar Department.

The eight grade personified their pencils this week. The papers of Fanny Petter and Effie Fyn were excellent.

Nearly all the pupils have made substantial gain in their standings over previous month, which is shown in their last test.

The average attendance for the past month was too small to publish, Jack Essenburg being the only pupil who was present every day.

In regard to the word stayed we do not hold that stayed is wrong, but we do hold that staid is not incorrect. Webster's Encyclopedic Dictionary, and by the way a good authority and one used in many schools, says that it is now spelled staid.

How About that New Cream Separator

Better buy one this spring, hadn't you? The old one is about wore out and it is costing you good round dollars every day you operate it. If the machine is not doing proper work it means a loss to you. If it is a few cents a day, in a year's time your loss would go a long ways towards paying for a new one. We can give you some good pointers on separators and at the same time save you money on your purchase. We handle the BLUE BELL and PRIMROSE at the following prices:

BLUE BELL	Nos. 1	2
	$60.00	$70.00 $80.00
PRIMROSE	Nos. 1	2
	$60.00	$70.00 $80.00

These machines have stood the test and a number of our best dairymen are using them.

Special for One Week

A good double Work Harness, regular selling price $48.00, for one week we sell at $45.00

Single Driving Harness, $14.00, $18.00 and $19.50

wasn't running down the possibility Mrs. Titus. I was merely questioning the advisability of elevating it in the way we Americans sometimes do."

"You did not put it so ably in discussing the principle with Alice," she said quickly. "Granted that her own marriage was a mistake, a dreadful mistake, it does not follow that all international matches are failures. I would just as soon be unhappily married to a duke as to a dry goods merchant, Mr. Smart."

"But not at the same price, Mrs. Titus," I remarked.

She smiled. "A husband is dear at any price."

"I shouldn't put it just that way," I protested. "A good American husband is a necessity, not a luxury."

"Well, to go back to what I started to say, Alice is very bitter about matrimony as viewed from my point of view. I am sorry to say I attribute her attitude to your excellent counseling."

"You flatter me. I was under the impression she took her lesson of Tarnowsky."

"Granted. But Tarnowsky was unfit. Why tar all of them with the same stick? There are good molders, you'll admit."

"But they don't need rehabilitation."

"Alas, I fear, will never risk matrimony. It's rather cautious, isn't it? When one stops to consider her youth, beauty and all the happiness there may be—"

"I beg your pardon, Mrs. Titus, but I think your fears are groundless."

"What do you mean?"

"The emptiness will marry again. I am not betraying a secret, because she has intimated as much to my secretary as well as to me. I take it that as soon as this unhappy affair is settled she will be free to reveal the true state of her feelings toward"—I stopped, somewhat discomfited by my garrulous turn.

"Toward whom?" she fairly snapped.

"I don't know," I replied truthfully and, I fear, ingenuously.

"Good heavens!" she cried, starting up from the bench on which we were sitting in the loggia. There was a queer expression in her eyes. "Hush!—hasn't she ever hinted at—hasn't she mentioned any one at all?"

"Not to me."

Mrs. Titus was agitated. I could see that very plainly. A thoughtful frown appeared on her smooth brow, and a gleam of anxiety sprang into her eyes.

"I am sure that she has had no opportunity to"—She did not complete the sentence, in which there was a primary note of perplexity and wonder.

It galled me to discover that she did not even so much as take me into consideration.

"You mean since the—er—divorce?" I inquired.

"She has been in seclusion all of the time. She has seen no man—that is to say, no man for whom she could possibly entertain a— But, of course, you are mistaken in your impression. Mr. Smart. There is absolutely nothing in what you say."

"A former sweetheart, autographed her marriage," I suggested hopelessly.

"She has no sweetheart. Of that I am positive," said she with conviction.

"She must have had an army of admirers. They were legion after her marriage. I may be pardoned for reminding you."

She started. "Has she never mentioned Lord Amberdale to you?" she asked.

"Amberdale?" I repeated, with a queer sinking of the heart. "No, Mrs. Titus. An Englishman?"

She was mistress of herself once more. In a very delicate manner she informed me that his lordship, a most attractive and honorable young Englishman, had been one of Alice's warmest friends at the time of the divorce proceedings. But of course there was nothing in that! They had been good friends for years, nothing more, and he was a perfect dear.

But she couldn't fool me. I could see that there was something working at the back of her mind, but whether it was distress or gratified I was not by way of knowing.

"I've never heard her mention Lord Amberdale," said I.

Her eyes narrowed slightly. Had I but known, the mere fact that the comely had spoken of his lordship provided her experienced mother with an excellent reason for believing that there was something between them. She abruptly brought the conversation to a close and left me, saying that she was off for her beauty nap.

PLAYED UNDER BIG HANDICAP

Charlevoix Independents in One-Sided Game at Traverse City.

Comparison of Size of Players Comes Nkely Under Head of "Longs" and "Shorts"—Score 79-33.

Last Friday our Charlevoix Hereuleans went down to defeat before the Traverse City Olympics to the tune of 79-33, but there is nothing to be ashamed of in the score. It was a fast and well played game throughout and, in spite of the one-sided score, it was a noticeable fact that Traverse City took no chances with substitutes until the last ten minutes.

The game was played in the Opera House. The floor was small and lined with rows of seats, which threatened bodily injury to the players several times. The opposing players were taller than our men with but one possible exception, that of center. As one of our players said, "If I tried to hold him he would lift up his arm, and there I'd be, up in the air, doing trapeze stunts on his arm." Their added height proved to be a decided advantage, as several times, especially in the first half, they took several shots at the basket, with our guards unable to leap high enough in the air to break it up. The ball was kept over the Herculeans' heads all the time. A striking characteristic of the Olympics' style of play was their ability to shoot baskets from apparently any and every spot on the floor, several being made from the center or even farther.

In the second half our boys made more of an impression. Ewing and Vogt made most of the baskets, Ewing making several very pretty shots from the corner of the floor. Vogt was sure death on the short ones, as usual, and made nearly all his chances for free throws. The guards were handicapped by their shortness of stature, but followed their men well, as did the center, breaking up many apparently sure points.

There were some noticeable features. When the visiting team went on the floor they were given a big round of applause. The crowd applauded whenever our team made a basket. No one in the audience hooted the referee's decisions, although several were rendered against the Olympics. Once or twice the players protested against what they thought might be a wrong interpretation of the rules, but never the rosters. A true sportsmanlike conduct permeated the whole game and made it a fine exhibition of basketball.

Among those from outside attending the game were Otto Hines, Geo. Gladys, D. E. Clow of Ellsworth and several from Petoskey.

Contracts were signed the first week by Manager Archie Livingston of the local independent team and the Flint Vehicle Association Basketball team to play a game on the local court to-morrow evening. The Flint Vehicles are one of the fastest basketball organizations in the state and thus far have swept every team before them in easy fashion. Northwestern University, one of the best college teams in the west this season, was defeated early in the winter by a decisive score and Alma college, runner-up for the state intercollegiate championship, also found the Vehicles to be a big proposition. The Flint people are making an extended tour to the northern part of the state, playing Charlevoix, Traverse City, Manistee, Muskegon and Ludington. This will probably be the biggest game of the season possibly with the exception of the Traverse Olympics, who make their appearance at the rink the first of next month.

There is also a probability that the Reos from Lansing will stop over here next Tuesday evening for an encounter. Manager Livingston is only waiting for the return contracts to confirm this statement, which he is very sure he will be able to do in a day or so.

Local fans should forget the disastrous results of last week's games with Harbor Springs and Traverse City. The Harbor game was more of a travesty than anything else, but the joint with the Olympics was lost to a team that was out of Charlevoix's class. The return game may bring different results. Thirty three points and fifty of these made by field baskets is not bad at all against men who are of the beef type.

In one of the fastest high school basketball games ever seen on the local court Charlevoix High lost to East Jordan, in the second game of the season, by a score of 33-29. Until the last two minutes of play the results hung in the balance, but the Jordan boys by a sudden effort secured two field baskets which decided the game in their favor. For the local school Kirby at center and Hallett at guard did the stellar work. This week the high school plays Boyne City, there. Boyne has practically the same team as last season and will undoubtedly give the local quintet a severe test for the beacon.

CHASE OSBORN OUT OF RACE

Former Governor Announces He Will Not Permit Use of His Name

In Presidential Candidacy—Makes Eloquent Appeal to Republicans to Stand Together.

With an appeal for Republicans of all factions to get together and end "misrule of Democratic novices at Lansing and Washington" Chase Osborn of the Soo formally withdrew Friday from any possible contest with U.S. Senator Wm. Alden Smith for control of the Michigan delegation to the Republican national convention at Chicago and threw his support unreservedly behind the candidacy of Michigan's senior senator for the Republican nomination for president.

Osborn's statement follows:

"I shall not be a candidate for president in the Michigan primaries. This statement appears to be warranted by a previous personal utterance to the effect that I would be a candidate if Senator Alden Smith were not. The candidature of Senator Smith has been announced and I had publicly tendered him my cordial support. Then came an interview in the New York Times quoting Senator Smith to the effect that there was nothing serious about his favorite son activity and that he was for somebody else. That was at once interpreted to mean that Senator Smith was only planning to control the Michigan situation for whatever might be gained by so doing. I did not like the interview or the interpretation.

"At about this time my name was suggested for the presidency by many influential persons and newspapers in several states. Desiring to further the dignity of Michigan and obtain for our state some of the great consideration it deserves, I challenged the position of Senator Smith.

"This caused Representative Patrick H. Kelley, manager of the Smith-for-president movement, to at once issue a formal statement that Senator Smith was a bonafide candidate. The senator himself was marooned in California by the floods.

"He has recently returned to Washington and fortified Mr. Kelley's statement by personal utterances that leave no doubt of the worthiness and earnestness of his position. Consequently I shall continue to give to him my earnest support.

"Senator Smith is a deserving son of Michigan. In a long and creditable career he has served in both houses of congress. In politics he resides in a position midway between the extremes and should appeal favorably to all factions this year when Republicans hunger for harmony in order that the real danger of Democratic misadministration may be removed and the paralysis of national honor cured.

"The nation has indeed fallen into a somber place. Nothing can rescue it until there is efficient government. This demands the defeat of the Democratic novices at both Washington and Lansing. No real preparedness can be planned until this is done. Only harmony born of common sense can equip the Republican party to do its work."

Supreme Court Decision Does Away With Great Annoyance to Travelers.

The following communication will be received with considerable gratification by the hundreds of Charlevoix summer visitors who come to this city each year to spend the season. The letter explains the matter in detail:

To our membership and guests of the Belvedere Hotel:

We take great pleasure in informing you that an order secured by your board more than a year ago from the Michigan railroad commission requiring the G. R. & I. and the Pere Marquette railroads to resume the issuing of joint passenger tariffs and through tickets to Charlevoix via Bay View and Petoskey from points south of Grand Rapids has just been confirmed by the United States supreme court in a denial of the appeal of the G. R. & I. railroad.

This means that by reason of this order our members and the guests of the Belvedere may in future buy through tickets to and from Charlevoix and Belvedere via Petoskey and Bay View and may check baggage through to destination. The annoyance of buying additional tickets and re-checking baggage at Petoskey and Bay View will be a thing of the past.

For four long years your board of trustees, realizing the inconvenience and annoyance caused our members and guests, has had this matter in hand through a committee of the board appointed to lay our grievances before the Michigan railroad commission and pray for relief. Ever since its appointment this committee has been steadily and persistently "on the job," with the result that it has rendered a distinct service which will be gratefully appreciated by the membership.

By order of the board,
Yours very truly,
Emerson W. Price, Jas. I. Dissette, Secretary. President.

Make Your Announcement.

If you are going to be a candidate for office do not hide your light under a bushel basket or wash-boiler, but step out in the open and get in print and tell the dear people what you would like to have, and it may be the voters will agree with you that you should have the nomination and proceed to elect you. Holding back waiting for the people to beg you to come out and declare your intentions will not advance your chances a bit. If you want anything nowadays you must go after it hard. If a place is worth having it is worth asking for.

Accidentally Shot.

George Bradshaw, Jr., was seriously wounded when the contents of a shotgun were accidentally discharged into his left arm and side. He and his father were preparing to go hunting Friday and as the father picked up the gun it slipped from his hand and in falling was discharged. The charge blew a hole through the boy's wrist and entered his side, making an ugly wound, from which he died in a short time.

Wood Wanted

Dry block beech and maple or some good buzz wood. If one-half of the men who promised to bring wood to this office in payment of subscription would do so we would have a two years' supply. Bring us in a load on the account.—The Charlevoix Courier.

FARMERS REALIZE NEED OF HELP

That Could Be Secured if County Had an Agricultural Agent.

Eighteen in State Already Have Them, with Three More Ready to Enter.

There is a noticeable increase in the number of county farm agents that are being employed throughout the state and the time will come when all the counties will be supplied with this necessary part of the machinery of successful agriculture. The counties that are holding back and hesitating to put money into a fund to pay for the hiring and maintaining of such an agent are the losers, as there is so much that can be done in the various lines that will profit the farmers. The day has gone by when farming can be done in a haphazard manner, and most farmers have reached a point where they realize the importance of having somebody to whom they can look for the information that they need at different seasons of the year. There is nothing gained by going without a county agent and, while there are some who move slowly and are hard to convince, the great majority see the importance of securing such expert service, which is at the command of all the people at any time they may need help along farm lines. In those counties where they have employed agents the people would not get along without one, which is a substantial recommendation for the idea. The farmers of Charlevoix county are slowly arriving at a point where they see the necessity for securing a county agent and it will not be long before one is obtained. All lines of business would benefit by the presence of a farm agent in the county and every loyal citizen should be willing to do his full share in bringing about conditions that will produce the funds necessary for securing an efficient man for the place.

The following counties in Michigan now employ an agricultural agent and the number is rapidly increasing. Three counties—Van Buren, Schoolcraft and Mason—are ready just as soon as a man can be appointed:

Upper Peninsula—Dickinson, Iron, Ontonagon, Houghton, Gogebic and Marquette.

Lower Peninsula—Cheboygan, Kent, Alpena, Newaygo, St. Clair, Lenawee, Allegan, Branch, Ottawa, St. Joseph, Saginaw, Kalamazoo and Wexford.

If these counties, which represent the least prosperous as well as the most prosperous sections of the state, are enjoying the benefits and profits which come from the employment of a farm adviser, why not our home county? In every county excepting one the county's share of the expenses of the agent are met by appropriations by the board of supervisors. The amounts raised for this purpose vary from $900 to $1200.

Dr. Eben Mumford of East Lansing is state leader of county agents.

DEATH IS LOOKED FOR

Henry W. Wickersham lies at Point of Death at Old Home in Portland, Indiana.

Word has reached this office that Henry W. Wickersham, a prominent Eveline township farmer, lies at the point of death at his old home in Portland, Indiana, where he went some three weeks ago in company with his wife for a visit.

Mr. Wickersham has been in poor health for some months, but his condition was not considered serious. On Wednesday morning of last week he suffered a stroke of paralysis, affecting his right side. Thursday morning about one o'clock he sustained another shock, affecting his left side, and since that time has lain in a comatose condition. A few days later pneumonia developed, and physicians state it is but a matter of a few hours before death claims him.

Arlo Wickersham of this city and Bert Wickersham of St. Louis, Missouri, arrived at his bedside last Friday and his two daughters arrived the day previous. Mr. Wickersham has been a resident of Eveline township for about three years and is highly respected by a large circle of acquaintanceship, who deeply regret that he is in such a serious condition.

ARE PLEASED WITH REPORT

Charlevoix W. C. T. U. Members Doing Great Work in City.

Are Always Willing to Lend a Helping Hand to Any Project for the Good of Humanity.

Members of the Charlevoix W. C. T. U. point with considerable pride to a report of their activities during the past year published in the February number of the Michigan Union. A great amount of work has been done, not only along temperance lines, but along other projects. Below is the report:

"The union in Charlevoix does so many things worthy of notice that I have felt impelled to write you a few. On December 12 we observed National Constitutional Prohibition Day; held a mass meeting presided over by the local president. We followed the program arranged by the National, the pastors taking the subjects assigned to them. Nineteen young women with pennants bearing the names of the nineteen dry states sang "The Fight Is On," and the children with flags and banners marched and sang "The Children's Happy Day." The song "Prohibition is in the Air" was rendered as a duet by two young ladies. The resolution for national constitutional prohibition was read and enthusiastically adopted by an audience of fully 500 people. The next morning telegrams were sent to the Michigan senators and representatives.

"In November our union gave a reception to the teachers of our public schools at the home of one of our members, which was attended by almost if not quite 100 people. We had special music, served refreshments and had talks by the pastors and the superintendent of schools on "The Relation of the Church and the W. C. T. U." and S. T. I. In the schools. The three pastors gave their names as honorary members, eight active members were gained and the county normal girls (twelve of them) took the pledge. Later, every teacher in our public schools signed our W. C. T. U. pledge and promised to assist us in our local work in every way they can. At the time of our district convention two of the normal girls attended as representatives of the county normal and at the reception they gave most interesting reports of the convention. We have recently placed 1000 temperance blotters in our schools, have put a copy of "The Temperance Compendium" by Edith Smith Davis in the schools, put a copy of the cigarette law in every place in our city where cigarettes are liable to be sold and have circulated a petition urging our prosecuting attorney to enforce the cigarette law and the law regarding minors in pool rooms. Altogether we are pushing the work and with our eighty members are considered a power for good in our beautiful little city. Our collection for the campaign fund was sent to the state treasurer some time ago, amounting to $15.27.

"Mrs. Jennie Alcox, President."

FIRE AT EAST JORDAN

Spencer Block Badly Burned—Heavy Loss to Occupants.

The Spencer block was badly gutted by fire Monday afternoon of last week in a blaze which taxed our fire department to its utmost to keep it from destroying the entire structure.

The fire originated near the roof of the back part and an alarm was turned in. The department responded promptly and an effort was made to extinguish the blaze with chemicals. The building is constructed mainly of pine, and this, coupled with the fire being just under the roof and almost inaccessible, made hard work for the firemen. Water was brought into play and this held the fire from going below the second story.

The store buildings were occupied by George Spencer with his plumbing shop and electrical supplies and by the Blount Bazaar Store. The second floor was divided into apartments, Geo. Spencer and his mother and family occupying a part and the families of Jessie Simmons and Walter Petrie the other apartments. Owing to the dense smoke caused by the burning pine it was impossible to save any of the household furnishings from the second floor and these were badly injured by the water and smoke. Some of the contents of Mr. Spencer's shop were removed, but the remainder of this stock, together with that of Blount's Bazaar, were soaked with the falling water.

Mr. Spencer carried fire insurance on the building and contents owned by him and Blount's Bazaar was insured.—East Jordan Herald.

DEATH OF MRS. BURR

Funeral Services Held from Home of Daughter Wednesday Forenoon.

Death claimed Mrs. Henry Burr, mother of Mrs. A. L. Coulter, at her daughter's home on Monday last.

Deceased has been in delicate health for a period of time and her demise was not unlooked for.

Alice D. Jones was born in Dexter, Michigan, February 8, 1842. She was married to Henry Burr on February 19, 1866. She is survived by two daughters, Mrs. E. E. Hapner of Mt. Pleasant, and Mrs. A. L. Coulter of this city; two sisters, Mrs. Celia Clark of Charlevoix and Mrs. Helen Burr of Dexter, Michigan.

Since the death of her husband in December, 1915, she has made her home with her daughter, Mrs. A. L. Coulter. Deceased had been a resident of Charlevoix since June, 1913, coming here from Ypsilanti, and during this time had made a number of intimate friends who will greatly miss her.

Funeral services were held from the Coulter home to-day (Wednesday) at 10:00 a. m., Rev. C. E. Taggart officiating. Interment at Brookside cemetery.

Michiganders Too Swift Says Health Secretary

Eat Too Fast; Walk Too Fast; Pace Too Fast—Go the Pace That Soon Kills.

Michigan is eating too fast, walking too fast, driving too fast, in fact, is literally and figuratively—the state board of health has the figures—going the pace that kills.

And just to prove that the pace that kills really does kill, Secretary John L. Burkart of the health board has taken the figures in the recent government census report and commented upon the showing made in the report by the Grim Reaper.

It seems that of all death's allies the most effective in Michigan during the years 1900 to 1916 was heart disease, a fact in which Mr. Burkart sees a deep lesson for Michiganders. However, Mr. Burkart admits that he has small hope that people in the state will heed the warning given in the census figures. He says:

"Heart disease has increased from 123.1 in 1900 to 150.8 in 1914.

This appalling rise places heart disease in first as a destroyer. We are paying the price of high living and intemperance in diet, pleasure, work and other things, which tend to encourage early and unexpected death. Overeating and irregular habits produce the degenerative diseases, and, notwithstanding the fact that we are saving thousands of children, we are losing a greater proportionate number of mature men and women whose value to the home and community cannot be computed.

"Will we profit by the warning con-

WILL OPERATE BOTH HOTELS

Hotel Charlevoix Purchased by Owners of Hotel Michigan.

Hotel Michigan to be Operated Only as a Summer Hotel—Change Made Tuesday.

The news that the Hotel Charlevoix had again changed ownership caused considerable surprise when the fact became generally known Tuesday. The deal had been kept a close secret until the final papers were signed late on Monday afternoon.

Tuesday at 1 o'clock Dr. J. A. Auld, who has owned and operated the hotel since last April, turned the active management over to Mr. and Mrs. Frank Blossat, owners of the Hotel Michigan, two of the best known hotel managers in Northern Michigan. Mr. and Mrs. Blossat need no introduction to the traveling public and the citizens of Charlevoix. For a number of years they have operated the Hotel Michigan, formerly known as the Elston Hotel, considered to be one of the best, if not the best, conducted all year round hotels in the upper part of the state.

In an interview with the new proprietors we were informed that the Hotel Michigan would be immediately closed and in the future will be run only as a summer hotel during the months of July, August and September. Since the fire which partially destroyed the hotel on March 30 of last year, this excellent hostelry has been almost entirely re-furnished and placed in a condition that it can be easily utilized as an exclusive summer hotel. There are few hotels better located in Charlevoix than the Michigan and under the present management it should do a flourishing business.

The Hotel Charlevoix is to be operated during the entire year. Its central location makes it a place where the traveling public can quickly reach the business houses, as well as those who come to the city bent upon recreation and pleasure. Under the past management of its owners the Charlevoix has been a well patronized and popular stopping place for tourists, as well as traveling men, and under the present ownership nothing will be neglected to give the same excellent service as in the past.

Dr. J. A. Auld and family will move into the H. B. Wood house on Clinton street on Thursday and the doctor will resume his dental practice, having his office at the house.

The ladies of St. Mary's church will give a baked goods sale on Saturday, February 26, in the Yettow store. A 15 cent lunch will be served in connection.

Merchants Complain of Large Credit Business

Forces Merchant to Borrow Money from Local Banks to Meet Monthly Bills.

A Charlevoix grocer was talking the other day about the difficulties and expenses of his business. He said his losses from bad credits are not at all serious. He had on his books at the present time several customers whose accounts he was unlikely to collect. They were of the kind that take the limit of credit and then go to another store and repeat the performance until they are finally refused credit and have to pay cash.

He said that the increasing tendency of the public to do business on credit is a far more serious problem. The number of people who come to his store and pay cash and carry the stuff away is declining. The great bulk of his trade run up bills that are paid once in one, two, three or more months. It takes a growing amount of capital to finance all this business. At the end of a month he often finds it a serious matter to tide over his obligations until the next month's payments begin to come in.

This involves a heavy charge for interest on loans. No longer can he do business on his own capital, but he must call on the banks or others for assistance. It is a part of the expense of running his business. His competitors, he believed, must also depend largely on borrowed resources. He believed that the consequence is that interest is a large factor in the cost of running a grocery business to-day and must be charged to the consumer just as much as clerk hire or taxes.

He thinks this custom is augmented in part by the increase of telephones and telephone orders. This necessitates more delivery trips, or at least more time spent in driving around with teams. The woman with the market basket has almost disappeared, while the 'phone is kept humming with orders to be carried to the homes. It is a condition that seems to exist about everywhere and is a big factor in the cost of living.

If the public wants to cut the cost of living, he said, it must get over this idea of buying on credit and must save the tradesman the interest charge which he now has to add to cost of his goods.

BACKACHE IS A WARNING

Charlevoix People Should Not Neglect Their Kidneys.

Backache is often nature's most frequent signal of weakened kidneys. To cure the pain and aches, to remove the lameness when it arises from weakened kidneys, you must reach the cause—the kidneys. If you have pain through the small of your back, urinary disorders, headaches, dizzy spells, or are nervous and depressed, start treating the kidneys with a tested kidney remedy.

Doan's Kidney Pills have been proved good and are especially for weak kidneys. Doan's have been used in kidney trouble for over 50 years. Read Charlevoix testimony.

Mrs. W. L. Cowan, 210 Antrim street, Charlevoix, says: "I don't hesitate to recommend Doan's Kidney Pills, for I had good results from them. I had a severe backache and pains in my kidneys and was also annoyed by the kidney secretions. I used Doan's Kidney Pills, procured at the Ivy Drug Store, and they brought me great relief."

Price 50c. at all dealers. Don't simply ask for a kidney remedy—get Doan's Kidney Pills—the same that Mrs. Cowan had. Foster-Milburn Co., Props., Buffalo, N. Y.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surface of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers that they offer One Hundred Dollars for anyone that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

WHY YOU ARE NERVOUS

The nervous system is the alarm system of the human body.

In perfect health we hardly realize that we have a network of nerves, but when health is failing, when strength is declining, the same nervous system gives the alarm in headaches, dizziness, dream sleep, irritability or unless corrected, leads straight to a breakdown.

To correct nervousness, Scott's Emulsion is exactly what you should take; its rich nutrient goes into the blood and rich blood feeds the nerve-cells while the whole system responds to its refreshing tonic for life. It is by far the most reliable tonic for the nervous system.

What to Do When Backache Comes on

"Foley Kidney Pills have done me more good than $150.00 worth of other medicine," writes Chas. M. Fox of Hiram, N. Y.

When backache comes on, and it seems as if you can't stand the pain and pressure in the small of your back and sides, do not feel that you must continue to suffer, but get a bottle of Foley Kidney Pills and begin taking them. They usually help from the very first doses.

It is worth a good deal to you to know that Foley Kidney Pills give you just what your system needs to repair the weak sick kidneys. It is their inability to do their work properly that causes your pain and misery. Foley Kidney Pills tend to middle-aged and elderly people the spryness and elasticity of youth. They take away the cause of backache, stiff and aching joints, rheumatic pains and annoying bladder and urinary troubles. Try them today.

PLOW OR DISK STUBBLE.

From tests that have been made plowing has been better for storing moisture than disk-ing. If heavy rains fall the increase in moisture content of plowed land over disked land is greater. This is to be expected, since the plowing lifts the surface of the soil more thoroughly and puts it in better condition to catch any rain that comes. The disk does not in all cases do this. It may be preferable if a soil does not blow when it is fall plowed—to plow the stubble fields instead of disk-ing them. This, however, is frequently impracticable, due to the dryness of the soil. Lifting the soil has been almost as good as plowing. We have not, however, made many tests to determine the effect of lifting.—Nebraska Station.

ENORMOUS WASTE BY WEEDS

Iowa Agricultural College Estimates a Loss of $25,000,000 in Iowa Alone. Experts of the Iowa Agricultural college estimate that weeds cost Iowa farmers not less than $25,000,000 a year. This is a huge sum, had it there is difficulty in crediting the possibility of a loss so enormous as springing from this source alone there need be small wonder. But the experts leave no room for doubt. They have made careful investigation in both field and laboratory, and they put on record the facts that these disclosed.

Weeds, says their bulletin, are harmful in a good many ways. They consume plant food that should go to the agricultural crop. They rob cultivated plants of sunlight. They take the moisture so essential for a crop, especially in a dry year. Weeds like the morning glory pull down a crop like wheat, corn or oats. Many of them harbor bad insects.

But there is little need to waste time giving a weed a bad reputation, says the Indianapolis News. That it has already, and the farmer knows from experience what weeds do to his crops. Translating the damage to dollars, however, and applying the figures to the state as a whole is likely to set the agriculturist thinking along new lines. It prescribes the subject from another viewpoint.

What is true of Iowa, of course, is true in proportion in other states. Iowa farmers are not slovenly farmers. Their fields are as well cultivated as the fields of farmers elsewhere. The weed is no greater menace there than it is in Indiana, and in Indiana, also, it is causing damage amounting to millions of dollars annually.

Killing Wild Oats.

Wild oats are one of the worst weed pests that the Colorado farmer has to deal with especially in the higher altitudes. Where wild oats have occupied the land for a number of years they usually have left a large amount of seed on and in the soil. Quite frequently when a given crop of wild oats is destroyed by cutting or plowing the land will immediately come up thickly with wild oats. The common impression is that the crop was not destroyed, whereas usually the growing crop was killed and the crop which appears is the result of the sprouting of seed already in the soil.

The best way to rid the land of wild oats is to use meadow crops or cultivated crops. If the wild oats are prevented from seeding and conditions made favorable for the sprouting of the seed in the ground they can be eradicated in a short time. The seed is known to have vitality enough to lie in the soil from three to seven years before germinating.—Alvin Keze, Colorado Station.

Spoon to Pit Peaches.

Put an old, heavy kitchen spoon on a griddle or use a file to cut it down from each side until it is half an inch wide. Grind each edge until sharp and you have a semicircular blade that passes easily around a peach pit without waste. The small handle of the spoon will likely cut the fruit. It may be best to cut off the spoon handle halfway up and attach a round wooden handle over this.

RANGE FOR CHICKS.

The problem of supplying a range or green feed for chicks does not receive sufficient attention. This is an important side of the proper rearing of poultry, and the farmer who has seen chickens or turkeys die from a poor green range has more than half his chick problem solved.

For temporary feeding one can soak oats overnight in water, wash them thoroughly next morning and spread them in half inch layers in boxes or trays. Place these trays in the shade outdoors and sprinkle with water twice daily. In from three to six days the oats will be ready for feeding. For baby chicks feed when the sprouts are one-half inch long, giving once daily what the chicks will eat in about ten minutes.

Bape may be sown and when grown up and fed to chicks. Cabbage, lettuce, mangel, beets and turnips can also be used for green feed.—Colorado Experiment Station.

Hello! You with Coughs Here's Speedy Relief

Stop the hacking and hacking, raise the phlegm, loosen the soreness with Foley's Honey and Tar Compound.

"Just like oil on troubled waters," is the way one grateful woman describes the benefit of Foley's Honey and Tar Compound.

It spreads a soothing, healing coating over the raw inflamed throat—loosens the hack—raises the phlegm—and really works wonders.

Why hack, hack, hack—driving everybody almost crazy, using up your strength, weakening your vitality and inviting serious sickness when there's speedy, soothing, sure relief in Foley's Honey and Tar Compound.

"After using medicine from the doctor, without result, for my grandchild, who was vomiting me," says Mr. J. A. Shanks, of Lewisburg, Ind. "I had to get up and get a bottle of Foley's Honey and Tar Compound out of my store and give them. After a few doses were given they went to sleep and slept throughout the night without coughing. I have handed Foley's Honey and Tar Compound for more than eight years and always recommend it."

You'll find Foley's Honey and Tar at your druggists. Be sure to ask for Foley's and see that you get the yellow package. Nothing else will do the work that Foley's Honey and Tar will do. 25c, 50c and $1.00 sizes.

Hold Fast to What You Have

IF there is anything more pathetic than the man who never had a home, or friend, or money, it is the man who had a home and did not appreciate it; friends and couldn't keep them; money and lost it.

The world is full of derelicts, and every town has its "has-beens" who once "were." It is a sad commentary on human life that men must work and sacrifice and save; practice thrift for years; accumulate a competence, and for one reason or another lose it all, and begin over again worse by far, except for the experience.

Men who were once citizens of affluence will be found in the bread line, sleeping in the parks at night, living on relatives, in the poor house, selling abominations on Broadway, when by better management they might have been in comfortable circumstances.

The deplorable effects of Democratic economic policies upon business conditions upon the Pacific Coast is shown by the story brought to Washington this week by Mr. Russell Hawkins of Portland, Oregon, who is extensively engaged in lumbering. Mr. Hawkins is the man who supplied the two hundred and fifty foot flag-pole for the San Francisco exposition, the tallest single stick flag-pole in the world.

"We have a lumbering plant in which $300,000 is invested and which, under normal conditions, employs 357 men, but which has not turned a wheel since June, 1914," said Mr. Hawkins. "Where we formerly had 357 busy men we now have one man with a grease pot to keep the rust off our idle machinery. There has been a slight revival in the last 60 days, but we have lost two years of active business. We closed down before the war broke out in Europe, which shows that depression in the lumber business was not due to the war, but to the general business depression which deprived us of a market for lumber products. Our experience was similar to that of other men engaged in logging and lumbering.

"You can readily see what the closing down of this small logging business means to industry, not only on the Pacific Coast, but in other parts of the United States. Directly, the throwing out of employment of 357 men means the loss of $220,000 a year in wages, and the loss of another $100,000 a year for supplies for our logging plant; but indirectly it means much more, for when our logging crews are out of employment, a much larger number of men are out of employment in the saw mills and in other industries depending thereon. The $300,000 which we would have paid to the men in our camps, if work could have continued, would have been spent by them for clothing, such as overalls, boots and shoes, gloves, hats, and articles manufactured in Eastern states. These men would have spent the money largely for provisions for the maintenance of their families. To be perfectly frank, perhaps it should be remarked that some of the money would be spent for the products that have made Kentucky and Milwaukee famous.

"Practically every industry in the United States suffered as a result of the depression in the lumbering business.
Railroads lost transportation business, carpenters had little demand for their services.

"Briefly stated, the closing down of any basic industry vitally and disastrously affects almost every other line of industry."

If Messrs. Wilson and McAdoo succeeded in imposing any more steep taxes upon this country they will do so only after they have overcome the opposition of Speaker Champ Clark, who threatens to taken the floor to make a fight against any such programme. In the light of history this is not a fearsome threat, for in the last Congress Mr. Clark took the floor to oppose the President in the matter of the canal tolls and was unsuccessful. To be sure, the Democratic majority in this Congress is much smaller than it was then and there are more constituents to be affected by the stamp taxes.

York admits that it is ejaculatory hard

During the hearing of a lawsuit the judge reproved a man for making unnecessary noise. "Your honor," was the reply, "I have lost my overcoat and I am looking about to find it." "Well, sir," said the judge, "people have often lost whole suits here without making as much disturbance as that."

The teacher said before the school exercised: "Now, Mary, if you forget some of the words when you are singing your song don't stop. Keep right on."

Say tum-tum-tummy-tum, or something like that, and the words will come back to you and nobody will know the difference. Now, don't forget." On exhibition day little Mary electrified her audience with: "And she wears a wreath of roses around her tummy-tum-tum." She did as she was told.

You can imagine the schoolmarm's astonishment, says Collier's Weekly, when Tommy returned to school with this note from his mother: "Dere Teacher: You keep tellin' my boy to brethe with his palate. Maybe rich children has got palates, but how about when their father only makes two dollars a day and has got six children?
First it's one thing, than it's another, and now it's palates. That's the wurst yet."

A clergyman tells an amusing story—as reported in a London paper—of a worthy vicar in a rural parish who had waxed eloquent in the interest of foreign missions one Sunday, and was surprised on entering the village shop during the week to be greeted with marked coldness by the old dame who kept it.
On asking the cause the good woman produced a half crown from a drawer and, throwing it down before him, said:
"I marked that coin and put it in the plate last Sunday, and here it is back in my shop. I knowed well them poor Africans never got the money!"

Scenes Painting.

In the past half century and more, especially since the improvement of the electric light, scene painting has become very elaborate and very expensive. Instead of being kept in its proper place as the decoration of the dramas, as a beautiful accessory of the action, it has often been pushed to the front, so as to attract attention to itself and thereby to distract attention from the play which it was supposed to illuminate. Shakespeare has been smothered in scenery, and the art of the actor has been subordinated to the art of the scene painter.—Brander Matthews in Scribner's Magazine.

Phonetic Spelling.

Phonetic spelling was evidently in fashion in the sixteenth century, when even Shakespeare could not spell his own name consistently. There is a letter dug from the correspondence of a lady of the sixteenth century in the book of the "Cotswold Family"—the Hicks-Beaches. Juliana writes—it is a matter of debt between the cautious widow and "My lord a Kaldre"—"My lord Ammaril and your wife I honour and love, but your false swearing and promise I hoterle a poro." What she really meant was "utterly abhor."—

THE NARROW BOSPORUS.

At Its Greatest Width It Measures
Only 9,838 Feet.

The Bosphorus contains few dangerous, submarine rocks or shoals. The depth of these few is indicated by lightness or buoy. The water is only slightly tinged with salt and is marvelously clear. The sunlit, glittering apparently near the surface, may be twenty feet below.

On a map, of whatever scale, each of those familiar straits, which cleave lands and continents asunder, seems hardly more than a silvery thread.
Yet as one sails over their famous waters the opposing shores on either hand sometimes appear far away. The strait of Gibraltar, which wrests Africa from Europe, is sixteen miles wide; that of Messina, forcing its way between Italy and Sicily, is from two to twelve; that of Bouffaco, which, like a blade of steel, cuts Corsica and Sardinia apart, is seven miles in width at its most contracted point; even the Dardanelles expands from one to four.

But the illusion as to distance created by the map is really as to the Bos-porus. Off Buyukdereh, where it attains its largest breadth, its hemmed in waters broaden to only 9,838 feet, or about one and four-fifths miles. Between Konnell Hissar and Anadolu Hissar they shrink to one-sixth of these dimensions, or to 1,611 feet.—
From "Constantinople," by Edwin A.
Grosvenor.

THE MUDDY MISSOURI.

How the River Lowers the Surface of the Land It Drains.

The Missouri is the muddiest river in the Mississippi valley. It carries more silt than any other large river in the United States except possibly the Rio Grande and the Colorado. For every square mile of country drained it carries downstream 381 tons of dissolved and suspended matter each year. In other words, the river gathers annually from the country that it drains more than 123,000,000 tons of silt and soluble matter, some of which it distributes over the flood plains below to form productive agricultural lands, but most of which finds its way at last to the gulf of Mexico.

It is by means of data of this kind that geologists compute the rate at which the lands are being eroded away.
It has been shown that the Missouri river is lowering the surface of the land drained by it at the rate of 1 foot in 6,000 years. The surface of the United States as a whole is now being worn down at the rate of 1 foot in 9,120 years.

It has been estimated that if this erosive action of the streams of the United States could have been concentrated on the Isthmus of Panama it would have dug in seventy-three days the canal which was completed after ten years' work with the most powerful appliances yet devised by man.—
Geological Survey Bulletin.

Quarantined.

In one of the little mountain towns of the south a Chautauque meeting was held last summer for the first time. The fact was advertised for some distance round the town, but the older negroes especially did not understand what it was all about.

Across the front of the little hotel of the village was hung a banner bearing the one word "Chautauque."
Up to this hotel one day drove an old negro in a one horse wagon containing a few vegetables, which he hoped to sell to the proprietor, as he had done on former occasions. But when he saw the banner with its ominous word he was seized with fright and would not go into the building or even get out of his wagon. When the proprietor appeared the old fellow inquired nervously, "What disense is you all quar-antined for, boss?"—Youth's Companion.

Tossing in a Blanket.

Tossing in the blanket is a very old sport or punishment. "Blanketing"
Ben Jonson called it, and in Holbrooke (1557) we find a denunciation of "jesting, plaing, blanketing and such other fittile and dishonorable gyleses." The French have a special verb,
"terner," for it, "terner" being the name given to the sheet or blanket used. The verb "terner" is also used for the Moorish punishment, in which four men hold the victim by his ankles and wrists and send him as high as they can—presumably with no blanket to catch him.

Now He Has Millions.

"See that fellow in the limousine?"
said one man to another at Washington and Illinois streets as a big car passed.
"Well, I can remember when he didn't have but one pair of socks; now he has millions."
"See, he must have some washings," replied the friend whose mind does not run to finances.—Indianapolis News.

By Comparison.

"Dubkins is a great comfort to me."
"I don't see how you can say that.
He's the most thesaurus chimp I have ever met."
"That's just it. Although I don't amount to much, it's true, every time I look at Dubkins I feel that I could amount to less."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

CHAPTER XXII.

The Owl.

ALONE, I soon became a prey to certain disquieting thoughts. Summed up they resolved themselves into a condition of certainty which admitted of but one aspect—the charming countess was in love with Amberline. And the shock of that part of it all was that she was in love with him prior to her separation from Tarnoway. I felt a cold premonition start out all over my body as this condition forced itself upon me. He was the man. He had been the man from the beginning. My heart was like lead for the rest of the day, and very curiously for a length of time it was subject to pain.

Just before dinner Britton, after inspecting me out of the corner of his eye for some time, advised me to try a little brandy.

"You look seedy, sir," he said, with concern in his voice. "A cold settling in perhaps, sir."

I tried the brandy, but not because I thought I was taking a cold. Some how it warmed me up. There is virtue in good spirits.

The countess was abroad very early the next morning. I discovered her in the courtyard, giving directions to Max and Rudolph, who were doing some spading in the garden. She looked very bright and fresh and enticing in the light of an early moon, and I was not only pleased, but astonished, having been led to believe all my life that a woman, no matter how pretty she may be, appears at her worst when the day is young.

I joined her at once. She gave me a gay, accusing smile.

"What have you been saying to mother?" she demanded as she shook hands with me. "I thought you were to be trusted."

I flushed uncomfortably. "I'm sorry, countess—I didn't know it was a secret."

She looked at me somewhat quizzically for a moment, then she laughed softly. "It is a secret."

"I hope I haven't got you into bad odor with your—"

"Oh, dear me, no! I'm not in the least worried over what mother may think. I shall do as I please, so there's the end of it."

I swallowed something that seemed to be sticking in my throat. "Then it is true that you are going to marry?"

"Quite," she said succinctly.

"I was silent for a moment. 'Well, I'm—I'm glad to know it in time.' I said rather more gruffly than was necessary."

She smiled too merrily I thought. "You must not tell any one else about it, however."

"I can promise that," I said, a sudden "are in my soul." "Devils could not drag it out of me. Rest easy."

It occurred to me afterward that she laughed rather jerkily, you might say uneasily. At any rate, she turned away and began speaking to Max.

"Have you had your breakfast?" I asked stupidly.

"No," she said. "Will you join me?"

"Isn't it getting to be a habit?"

"Breakfast or—?"

"Breakfast and me."

"I confess, my dear countess, that I like you for breakfast," I said gallantly.

"That is a real tribute," she said demurely and took her place beside me. Together we crossed the courtyard.

On the steps Collingraft thus was standing. I uttered an audible groan and winced as if in dire pain.

"What is it?" she cried quickly.

"Rheumatism," I announced, carefully raising my right arm and affecting an expression of torture. I am not a physical coward, kind reader. The fact that young Mr. Titus carried in his hands a set of formidable looking boxing gloves did not frighten me. Heaven knows, if I would give into any pleasure to stain me about with a pair of gloves I am not without physical path and mental fortitude. It was diplomacy, cunning, astuteness—whatever you may choose to call it—that stood between me and a friendly encounter with him. Two minutes later would serve to convince him that he was my master, and then where would I be? Where would be the prestige I had gained? Where my reward as a conqueror? I must have caught cold in my arms and shoulders. I went on making worse faces than before as I moved the afflicted parts experimentally.

"There," she exclaimed ruefully, "I knew you would catch cold! Men at ways do. I'm so sorry."

"It's nothing," I made haste to explain—"that is nothing serious. I'll get rid of it in no time at all." I calmed for a minute. "A week or ten days at the most. Good morning, Collingraft."

"He's all crippled up with rheumatism, Coll," she said. "Put those ugly things away. We're going in to breakfast."

He tossed the gloves into a corner of the vestibule. I felt a little ashamed of my subterfuge in the face of his earnest expression of concern.

"Tell you what I'll do," he said warmly. "I know how to rub a fellow's muscles—"

"Oh, I have a treasure in Britton!" said I hastily. "Thanks, old man. He will work it out of me. Sorry we can't have a go this morning."

The worst of it all was that he insisted, as a matter of personal education, on coming to my room after breakfast to watch the expert maneuvers of Britton in kneading the sufferer out of my muscles. He was looking for new ideas, he explained. I first consulted Britton and then resignedly consented to the demonstration.

To my surprise, Britton was something of an expert. I confess that he almost killed me with those strong, iron-like hands of his. If I was not sore when he began with me I certainly was when he finished. Collingraft was most enthusiastic. He said he had never seen any one manipulate the muscles so scientifically as Britton and ventured the opinion that he would not have to repeat the operation often. To myself I said that he wouldn't have to repeat it at all.

We began laying our plans for the 14th. Communications arrived from Italy addressed to me, but intended for either the countess or the rather remote Mr. Bangs, who seemed better qualified to effect himself than any human being I've ever seen. These letters informed us that a yacht, one of three now cruising in the Mediterranean, would call at an appointed port on such and such a day to take her out to sea. Everything was being arranged on the outside for her escape from the continent, and precision seemed to be the watchword.

Of course I couldn't do a stroke of work on my novel. How could I expect to devote myself to fiction when fact was staring me in the face so engagingly? We led an idle, dolce far niente life in these days, with an underlying touch of anxiety and excitement that increased as the day for her departure drew near. I confess to a sickening sense of depression that could not be shaken off.

Half of my time was spent in playing with Rosemary. She became dearer to me with each succeeding day. I knew I should miss her tremendously. I should even miss Jinko, who didn't like me, but who no longer growled at me. The castle would be a very gloomy, dreary place after they were out of it. I found myself wondering how long I would be able to endure the loneliness. Secretly I cherished the idea of selling the place if I could find an innkeeper in the market. I didn't suppose there was anybody in the whole world crazy enough to buy it.

An unexpected diversion came one day when, without warning and I guess, I was out of a clear sky, the Hazards and the Billy Smiths swooped down upon me. They had come up the river in the power boat for a final September run and planned to stop overnight with me.

They were the last people to the world whom I could turn away from my door. There might have been a chance to put them by for the night and still avoid disclosures had not circumstance ordered that the countess and I should be working in the garden at the very moment that brought them pounding at the postern gates. Old Conrad opened the gate in complete ignorance of our presence in the garden. (We happened to be in a somewhat obscure nook and seated upon a stone bench, so he must be held blameless.) The quartet brushed past the old man, and I, hearing their chatter, foolishly exposed myself.

I shall not attempt to describe the scene that followed their discovery of the Countess Tarnoway. Be it said, however, to the credit of Elsie and Betty Billy the startled refugees were fully smothered in kisses and tears and almost deafened by the shrill, disconcerting the count. It appears that he and the haron had quarreled, and at the time of my friends' departure from Vienna it was pretty generally understood that there would be a duel.

"I never liked the haron," I said, with a grim smile that could not have been misinterpreted, "but I hope to heavens he isn't killed."

Mrs. Titus sighed. "Tarnoway is regarded as a wonderful marksman."

"Worse luck!" growled Collingraft, gloomily twiddling his thumbs.

"What kind of a shot is the haron?" asked Jasper Junior hopefully.

No one was able to enlighten him, but Billy Smith shook his head dolefully.

"Maris Tarnoway is a dead shot. He'll pot the haron sure."

"Hang it all," said I, and then lapsed into a horrified silence.

When the Hazards and Smiths departed the next morning they were in full possession of all of our plans, hopes and secrets, but they were bound by promises that would have haunted them throughout all eternity if they allowed them to be violated. I do not recall having seen two more intensely excited, radiant women in my life than Elsie and Betty Billy. They were in an ecstatic state of mind. Their husbands, but little less excited, offered to help us in every way possible, and to prove their earnestness, turned the prow of the motorboat down stream, abandoning the trip up the river in order to be in Vienna in case I should need them for any purpose whatsoever.

"You may rest easy so far as I am concerned," Mrs. Titus said the young diplomat. "As a representative of the United States government I can't honestly be publicly involved in this international muddle. I've just got to keep my lips sealed. If it were discovered that I knew of all this, my head would be under the guillotine in no time at all. Swish! Officially understood!"

At 10 o'clock the next morning I was called to the telephone. Smith had starting news to impart. Count Tarnoway and Baron Unwittich had engaged in a duel with pistols at sunrise and the latter had gone down with a bullet through his lungs. He died an hour later. Tarnoway, according to the rumors flying about official Vienna, was already on his way to Berlin, where he would probably remain in seclusion until the affair blew over or imperial forgiveness was extended to him.

There was cause for satisfaction among us, even though the haron had fallen instead of the count. The sensational affair would serve to keep Tarnoway under cover for some weeks at least and minimize the dangers attending the countess' flight from the castle. Still, I could not help feeling disappointed over the outcome of the meeting. Why couldn't Count Tarnoway have been the one to fall?

The countess, very pale and dispirited, gave utterance to her feelings in a most remarkable speech. She said: "This is one of the few fine things that Maris has ever done. I am glad that he killed that man. He should have done so long ago, the least! He was—ugh!—the most despicable creature I've ever known."

She said no more than this, but one could readily grasp all that she left unuttered.

Collingraft rather sentimentally remarked to little Rosemary, who could not have comprehended the words of course, "Well, little Rosebud, your papa may be a spendthrift, but he never wastes bullets."

What was entirely uncalculated for, I contend, I was struck by the swift look of dread that leaped into Alene's eyes and her pallor.

On top of all this came the astonishing news by cipher dispatch from old Jasper Titus' principal adviser in Lou don that his offer of $1,000,000 had been declined by Tarnoway two days before, the count having repelled through his lawyers that nothing short of two millions would induce him to relinquish all claims to his child.

I had been ignorant of this move in the case and expressed my surprise.

"I asked father to do it, Mr. Smart," said the countess dejectedly. "It seemed the easiest way out of our difficulties and the cheapest. He will never give in to this new demand though. We must make the best of it."

"But why did you suggest such a thing to him?" I demanded with heat.

She looked hurt. "Because you seemed to think it was the right and honorable thing to do," she said patiently. "I do not forget what you said to me days and days ago even though it may have slipped your mind. You said that a bargain is a bargain and well, I had Mr. Bangs write father just what you thought about it."

There was a suspicion of tears in her voice as she turned away and left us without another word. She was quite out of sight around the bend in the staircase and her little boots were clattering swiftly upward before I fully grasped the significance of her explanation—or, I might better say her reproach. It slowly dawned upon me that I had said a great many things to her that it would pay me to remember before questioning her motives in any particular.

As the day for her departure drew nearer—I was now but forty-eight hours away—her manner seemed to me to undergo a complete change. She became moody, nervous, depressed. Of course all this was attributable to the dread of discovery and capture when she was once outside the great walls of Schloss Rothemann. I could understand her feelings and rather sympathetically attempted to bolster up her courage by making light of the supposed perils.

She looked at me with a certain pathos, sometimes, in her eyes. I confessed my heart to ache. All of her previous railway was gone. All of her tentative apprehensions. Her secret life in these last days seemed to be of a different nature. She was aware and gentle with every one—with me in particular. I may say—and there was something positively humble in her attitude of self abnegation. Where she had once been wilful and ironical she was now gentle and considerate. Nor was I the only one to note these subtle changes in her. I doubt, however, if the others were less puzzled than I. In fact, Mrs. Titus was palpably perplexed, and there were times when I caught her eyeing me with distinct disapproval, as if she were seeking in me the cause of her daughter's weakness, as much as to say, "What other nonsense have you been putting into the poor child's head, you wretch?"

I went up to have a parting room with Rosemary on the last night of her stay with me. The countess paid but little attention to us. She sat over in the window and stared out into the dusky shadows of the falling night. My heart was sore. I was miserable. The last romp!

Blake finally snatched Rosemary off to bed. It was then that the countess aroused herself and came over to me with a sad little smile on her lips.

"Good night," she said rather wistfully, holding out her hand to me.

"I deliberately glanced at my watch. 'It's only two minutes past 8,' I said reproachfully.

"I know," she said quietly. "Good night."

CHAPTER XXIII.

I Speed the Parting Guest.

OUR O'clock in the morning is a graceless hour. Graveyards may yawn at 12, but even they are content to slumber at 4. I don't believe there is anything so desolate in this world as the mental perspective one obtains at 4 o'clock. Tombstones are bright beacons of cheer as compared to the monumental regret one experiences on getting up to greet the alleged and vastly overrated glories of a budding day. The sunrise is a pall. It is a deadly, dour thing. It may be pink and red and golden and full of all the splendors of the east, but it is a resurrection, and you can't make anything else out of it. Staying up till 4 and then going to bed gives one an idea of the sunrise that is not supported by the facts. There is but one way to appreciate the real nature of the hateful thing called dawn, and that is to get up with it instead of taking it to bed with you.

Still, I suppose the sun has to come up, and perhaps it is just as well that it does so at an hour when people are least likely to suspect it of anything so shabby.

Four o'clock is more than a graceless, sodden hour when it ushers in a day that you know is to be the happiest in your life; when you know that you are to say farewell forever to the hopes begot and nurtured in other days; when the one you love smiles and goes away to smile again, but not for you. And that is just what 4 o'clock on the morning of the 14th of September meant to me.

Britton and I set forth in the automobile just at the break of dawn, crossing the river a few miles below the castle and running back to a point on the right bank where we were to await the arrival of the boat conveying the countess and her escort. Her luggage, carefully disguised as created merchandise, had gone to Trieste by fast express a couple of days before, sent in my name and concealed to these names. I do not now recall, but who in reality served as a sort of middleman in transferring the shipment to the custody of a certain yacht's commander.

It was required of me—and of my machine, which is more to the point—that the distance of 120 miles through the foothills of the Austrian Alps should be covered and the passengers delivered at a certain railway station fifty miles or more south of Vienna before 10 o'clock that night. There they were to catch a train for the little seaport on the upper Adriatic, the name of which I was sworn never to reveal, and as I have not considered it worth while to be released from that oath, I am of necessity compelled to omit the mention of it here.

Mr. Bangs went on to Vienna the night before our departure, taking with him Helene Marie Louise Antoinette, a rather shocking arrangement, you would say, unless you had come to know the British lawyer as well as we knew him. They were to proceed by the early morning train to this obscure seaport. Collingraft thus elected to accompany his sister the entire length of the journey, with the faithful Blake and Rosemary.

Billy Smith was to meet us a few miles outside the town for which we were bound, with a word of warning if there was anything sinister to the wind.

I heard afterward from Poppendyke that the departure of the countess and Rosemary from the castle in the gray, forlorn dawn of that historic 14th was attended by a demonstration of grief on the part of the four Schmicks that was far beyond his powers of description, and he possesses a wonderful ability to describe the heinousness of things, rather running to that style of incident. I may say. The elder Schmicks walked and bowed and pre-attended to the utmost minute detail of them, and to prove that she was quite in earnest about the matter, trotted off, the duck into the river and was nearly drowned before Jasper Junior could dive in to get her. Then, both of whom carried strong feelings for Blake, signed so passionately all the way down the river that the boat rocked. Fortunately during the excitement Blake, who was to remain behind in the journey westward, later on with Mrs. Titus and Jasper Junior, succeeded after weeks of vain endeavor in finally happening there.

A FOOL AND HIS MONEY

of Hawkes' left leg, a feat of which he had no doubt was proud, but which seemed to me an impressive butler to an everlasting dread of hydrophobia and a temporary limp.

It was nearly 5 o'clock when the boat slipped into view around the tree covered point of land and headed straight for our hiding place on the bank.

I shall not stop here to describe the first stage of our journey through the narrow, rocky byroads, that ended eventually in the broad alpine highway south and west of Vienna. Let it be sufficient to say that we jostled along for twelve or fifteen miles without special incident, although we were nervously anxious and apprehensive. Our guidebook pointed, or rather twiddled, a route from the river flats into the hills, where we came up with the main road about 8 o'clock.

We were wrapped and goggled to the verge of ludicrousness. It would have been quite impossible to penetrate our motor masks and armor even for one possessed of a keen and practiced eye. The countess was heavily veiled. Green goggles hid beneath the green, gauzy thing that protected her lovely face from sun, wind and man. A motor coat two or three sizes too large enveloped her slender, graceful figure, and gauntlets covered her hands. Even Rosemary's tiny face was wrapped in a silken veil of white. As for the rest of us, we could not have been mistaken for anything on earth but American automobilists ruthlessly hissed to see Europe with the sole view to comparing her roads with our own at home. You would have said on seeing us that we knew a great deal about roads and very little about home.

Collingcraft and Britton, the latter at the wheel, sat in the front seat, while I shared the broad cushions of the toupie with the countess, part of the time holding Rosemary, who was clamoring for food, and the rest of the time holding my breath in the fear that she might slip over a precipice. I am always nervous when not driving the car myself.

We stopped for breakfast at a small mountain inn fifteen miles from our starting place. The countess, a stout red spot in each cheek and a curiously bright, feverish glow in her dark eyes, revealed a tendency to monopolize the conversation, a condition properly attributed to nervous excitement. I could see that she was vastly thrilled by the experiences of the hour. Her quick, alert brain was keeping pace with the rush of blood that stimulated every fiber in her body to new activities. She talked almost incessantly and chiefly about matters entirely foreign to the enterprise in hand. The more I see of women the less I know about them. Why she should have spent the whole half hour devoted to breakfast on a surprisingly innocuous dissertation on Schopenhauer and Nietzsche is, or was, beyond me.

How was I to know that tears lay close to the surface of those shimmering, vivacious eyes? How was I to know that sob's took refuge behind a simulated interest in philosophy?

We had luncheon picnic fashion half way to our journey's end, diverging from the main road to find a secluded spot where we could spread our cloth and open our hamper without fear of interruption or to use a more sinister word, detection. It was rather a jolly affair, that first and last at fresco bank quiet of ours under the spreading branches of mighty trees and beside the trickling waters of a gay little mountain brook that hurried like mad down to the broad channel of the Danube, now many miles away. The strain of the first few hours had slackened. Stress seemed assured. We had encountered no difficulties, no dangers in town or country. No one appeared to be interested in us except through idle curiosity; villagers and peasants stared at us and grinned; no lieutenants and soldiers stood aside to let us pass or gave directions politely when requested to do so. There were no signs of pursuit, no indications of trouble ahead. And so we could afford to be gay and confident at our midday meal in the hills bordering the broad highway.

We even went so far as to arrange for a jolly reunion in New York city at no distant day. I remember distinctly that we were to dine at Sheraton. To me the day seemed a long way off.

I suppose, being a writer of fiction, I should be able to supply at this point in the narrative a series of thrilling, perhaps hair-raising, encounters with the enemy in the form of spies, cutthroats, imperial mercenaries or whatever came handiest to the imagination. It would be a very simple matter to transform this venetian history into the most lurid of melodramas by the introduction of the false and the bizarre, but it is not my purpose to do so. I mean to adhere strictly to the truth and stand by the consequences. Were I inclined to sensationalism it would be no trouble at all for me to have Rosemary's agents shooting at our throats or gasoline tank from every crag and canyon or to have Rosemary kidnapped by aeroplanists supplied with drag hooks or to have the countess lodged in a village prison, from which I should be obliged to liberate her with battle-axe and six shooter, my compensation being a joyous rest in a hospital with the fair Alina nursing me back to health and strength and roaring food.

worlds in my rapacious ear the while I reflected on the noble endowments of a nature that heretofore had been commonplace and meek. But not one of these things happened, and I decline to perjure myself for the privilege of getting into the list of "big best sellers."

So for as I am able to judge there was absolutely no heroism displayed during our flight through the hills and valleys unless you are willing to accept as such a single dash of sixty miles an hour, which Britton made in order to avoid a rain shower that threatened to drench us if we observed the speed laws.

But wait! There was an example of bravado on my part that shall not go unrecorded. I hesitated at first to put it down in writing, but my sense of honor urges me to confess everything. It happened just after that memorable picnic luncheon in the shady dell. The countess, I maintain, was somewhat to blame for the incident. She suggested that we—that is to say, the two of us—explore the upper recesses of this picturesque spot, while the others were making ready for the resumption of our journey.

Shame, contrition, humiliation or whatever you may elect to call it, for bids a lengthy or even apologetic explanation of what followed her unfortunate suggestion. I shall get over with it in as few words as possible.

In the most obscure spot in all those ancient hills I succumbed to an excruciating impulse to take her forcibly in my arms and kiss her! I don't know why I did it or how, but that is just what happened. My shame, my horror over the transcendental folly was made almost unbearable by the way in which she took it. At first I thought she had swooned, she lay so limp and unconscious in my arms. My only excuse, whispered penitently in her ear, was that I couldn't help doing what I had done and that I deserved to be drawn and quartered for taking advantage of my superior strength and her gentle forbearance. Strange to say, she merely looked at me in a sort of dumb wonder and quietly released herself, still staring at me as if I were the most inexplicable puzzle in the world. Her cheeks, her throat, her brow grew warm and pluk with a just indignation. Her lips parted, but she uttered no word. Then I followed her dejectedly, cravenly back to the roadside and executed an inward curse that would hang over my miserable head so long as it was on my shoulders.

Her vivacity was gone. She shrank down into the corner of the seat, and, with her back half turned toward me, gazed steadfastly at the panoramic valley which we were skirting. From time to time I glanced at her out of the corners of my eyes, and eventually was somewhat relieved to see that she had closed her own and was dozing. My soul was in despair. She loathed, despised me. I could not blame her. I despised myself.

And yet my heart quickened every time I allowed myself to think of the act I had committed.

The day was a glorious one and the road more than passably good. We bowled along at a steady rate of speed and sundown found us about twenty-five miles from our destination. Not caring to run the risk of a prolonged stay in the town, we drove up at a roadside inn and had our dinner in the quaint little garden, afterward proceeding leisurely by moonlight down the sloping highway.

Billy Smith met us six or eight miles out, and we stopped to part. He examined the countess' skillfully prepared passports, pronounced them genuine and then gave us the cheerful news that "everything was lovely and the goose hung high." The train for the coast was due to leave the Santa's bahnhof at 10:35, and we had an hour to spare. He proposed that we spend it quite comfortably at the roadside while Britton went through the pretense of repairing our tires. This seemed an agreeable arrangement for every one but Britton, who looked so glum that I, glad of the excuse, offered to help him.

No sooner was I out of the car and Billy Smith in my place beside the countess than she became quite gay and vivacious once more. She laughed and chatted with him in a manner that promptly convinced me that propriety so far as I was concerned had had a most depressing effect upon her and that she reveled in the change of companions.

I was so disturbed by the discovery that Britton had to caution me several times to handle the inner tubes less roughly or I would damage them and we might suffer a blowout after all.

Every one appeared to be gay and frivolous, even Blake, who chattered sotto voce with Britton, that excellent rascal spending most of his time leaning against the spare tire in order to catch what she was saying for his benefit. All efforts to draw me into the general conversation were unavailing. I was as morose and unresponsive as an Egyptian mummy, and for a very excellent reason, I submit. The countess deliberately refused to address a single remark to me. Indeed, when I seemed perilously near to being drawn into the conversation she relapsed into a silence that was most forbidding. My cup of misery was overflowing.

I wondered if she would feel called upon at some distant confessional to tell the fortunate Lord Amberdale that I had brutally kissed her. And Lord Amberdale would grin in his beastly supercilious English way and say, "What else could you have expected from a hally American bomber?" She would no doubt smile indulgently.

All things come to an end, however. We found ourselves at last uttering our goodbyes in the railway station, surrounded by hurrying travelers and attended by eager porters.

The countess did not lift her veil. I

A number of young friends and playmates helped James Bellinger, son of Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Bellinger, celebrate his seventh birthday on Tuesday of last week. The usual stunts pulled off by the little men and women occurred on this occasion, which was a merry one for all present.

Nine old maids drove over from Boyne City Wednesday evening of last week. They were not really old maids—only for one night.—Contributed. The scenery of men on the streets on the above evening was quite noticeable, causing considerable comment, but the above explains the situation.

Saturday afternoon Gereldine Brock entertained ten of her little girl friends at a party in honor of her 5th birthday. The child's birthday came on Monday, February 14th, the same date as that of her teacher, Miss Jarvis. The party was held Saturday so the teacher might attend as a guest of honor. Refreshments were served and a delightful afternoon was spent with the little hostess. Gereldine is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ed. Brock of this city.

DO YOUR VERY BEST.

Be Earnest and Thorough and You Are Bound to Succeed.

There is a feature of Dickens' character which cannot be too often or too seriously insisted upon, and that is his intense earnestness and thoroughness in everything he did. He said to me more than once:

"My dear boy, do everything at your best. If you do that neither I nor any one else can find fault with you, even if you fail. For myself, I can honestly say that I have taken as great pains with the smallest thing I ever did as with the biggest."

In giving advice to a young author he said on one occasion:

"If you want your public to believe in what you write you must believe in it yourself. When I am describing a scene I can as distinctly see what I am describing as I can see you now. So real are my characters to me that on one occasion I had fixed upon the course which one of them was to pursue. The character, however, got hold of me and made me do exactly the opposite to what I had intended. But I was so sure that he was right and I was wrong that I let him have his own way."

Whatever he did either in work or in play he always gave of his very best. He hated sloveness or half heartedness in any shape or form.—Harper's Weekly.

ODDITIES OF VISION.

Peculiar Optical Effects and the Yellow Spot in the Eye.

If one places a pinhead up close to and directly in front of the eye the head of the pin appears transparent and things may be seen as easily through it as through a sheet of plain glass, the head appearing simply as a large round cloud. If it is placed somewhat closer no pin or head can be seen at all.

If one goes into a very dark room and puts a lighted candle near the side of one eye very pretty and peculiar effects are observed. A tracery, forming a regular network, can be easily detected, and this is merely the shadow thrown by the candle on the retina of the eye of the small capillary blood vessels between the retina and the candle.

If one looks to the side of a dim star in the heavens the star appears a great deal brighter than direct vision makes it appear. This is because the light in the direct view falls on what is known as the "yellow spot" or point of keenest vision. As this is not put directly behind the front of the eye the side vision is necessary. Some people can see stars that way that they cannot perceive at all on direct vision.—Pittsburgh Dispatch.

A Garrick Incident.

David Garrick, whose speaking was concerned, was the pride of London. Members of parliament envied him his powers. Burke envied him. There is that instance in parliament when, during a heated debate, a member moved that the gallery be cleared. This was ordered to be done, and the strangers withdrew, all save Garrick. Still the member objected. Then up spoke Burke. Would it be fair to exclude from their debate the master of eloquence, the genius who taught them the art of speaking? he demanded. For himself he was proud to acknowledge his indebtedness to Garrick. Fox followed in the same strain, and Townsend. The house then voted that the "stranger should remain." And Garrick did not budge.—St. James' Gazette

Soho Square, London.

Soho is perhaps the most curiously derived place name in London. According to Samuel Pegge, the antiquary, Soho square, which has given a name to the district, was first called Monmouth square when the ill fated Duke of Monmouth had a house there. Upon the duke's defeat and execution in 1685 the square was ordered to be called King's square, and a statue of King Charles II. was set up in the middle of it. But the partisans of the Duke of Monmouth, wishing to preserve a distant remembrance of their leader, called it Soho square, from "Soho" a hunting cry adopted by the duke, as his watchword at the battle where he was taken prisoner.—London Saturday Review.

Justice.

A Sunday school teacher had been telling her class of little boys about crowns of glory and heavenly rewards for good people.

"Now, tell me," she said at the close of the lesson, "who will get the biggest crown?"

There was a silence for a minute or two, then a bright little chap piped out:

"I'm wot's got t' biggest 'ead."—London Tit-Bits.

Futility of Argument.

Plato defined man as "a two legged animal without feathers." Diogenes, who heard this, plucked a cock. "This is Plato's man," said he. But never you think the old timer lacked a "come-back." He added to his original definition the words, "With broad flat nails." Such is the futility of argument.—Springfield Republican.

The One Advantage.

"Traded your motor boat for an aeroplane, eh? What's the idea?"

"Well, there's this about an aeroplane—even if the engine does break down, you're bound to land somewhere."—St. Louis Post Dispatch Passionate love always denies their anger and passions often best their reason.

Miss McLaren Has Appeared Before in This City.

Extra Number on Lecture Course Saturday Evening—Ticket Sale Thursday.

Extra number of the lecture course Saturday night next. This number is free to all holders of season tickets. Single admissions are fifty cents.

Miss Gay Zenola McLaren is not a stranger in Charlevoix, for she has already won many of the people of our town by her impersonation of "Peg o' My Heart" in the Chautauqua program.

Miss McLaren is in a class by herself. In no way can she be compared with the ordinary interpretative reader. She keeps twenty characters before you at once; she acts with firm and intensity and authority. Her imitation is perfect.

We know that those who have heard her will be there. We want everyone to hear her. It is a chance to see one of the world's artists.

Reserve seat sale at the Central Drug Store Thursday at seven o'clock. Don't forget to bring your season ticket.

NOW READY FOR BUSINESS

Chemical Fire Engine Recently Purchased Arrived Last Week.

The new chemical fire engine has arrived and is now on exhibition in front of the W. A. Boss hardware store. The fire fighting apparatus is a late design and without a doubt will prove one of the best investments so far made by our village.

In most places where chemical engines are not employed, the loss by the water greatly exceeds that caused by the fire. Hundred of dollars in house furnishings have been ruined in neighboring towns by water, which would have been reduced to a minimum had it been possible to use a chemical.

The people of Ellsworth can now rest assured that proper protection will be given them in case of fire, but they should not forget to dig down in their pocketbook for the payment of the original purchase price and its proper maintenance.

It means a protection to the small property holder as well the large. Another engine of this size would reduce the fire rating of the village to a fifth class town, which means lowering insurance rates to a considerable extent.

Grange was a grand success at the last meeting, although held on a new date. In fact it was such a success that it was voted that the grange should meet every alternate Saturday instead of Tuesday.

D. E. Clow surprised the Grange by sending up good hot coffee. Mr. Clow is bound to make the grange believe he can produce better goods than old "Sears." With a few more such feeds we'll try not to contradict him again.

We are expecting to have a very hot debate next grange meeting on the subject: "Antrim County should have a County Agent." E. R. Harris has the affirmative and L. K. Clark the negative sides. The judges will be elected that night and the results declared.

A MARRIAGE CONTRACT

It Was Made by Two Mothers for Their Babies.

By JOHN Y. LARNED

Miss Cunningham's mother had been dead a month. The daughter did not wish to live in the big house alone, and she did not wish to leave it. Nevertheless, having no one to live with her, she determined reluctantly to shut it up and become a wanderer. With a view to leaving matters in good order and clearing out a good deal of accumulation she set herself to work, beginning with antiquated family documents. She was engaged on a trunkful of papers when she came upon what was marked on the back, "Contract between Mrs. Mary Cunningham and Mrs. Sarah Forbes," which set forth that Mrs. Cunningham contracted to marry her daughter Emma, then just born, to Mrs. Forbes' son Edwin, a boy of three years, said marriage to take place when the children should become respectively twenty-three and twenty.

Emma Cunningham sat for some time with this paper in her hand as if in a dream. The contract was doubtless the result of a strong friendship between two young women and probably had been entered into with slight probability of ever being carried out. Emma's mother had never mentioned it to her daughter and quite likely had forgotten it. Emma remembered Edwin Forbes when he was fourteen years old, a well formed boy, whom she had considered attractive, though she being but eleven, he had looked upon her as a kid and treated her accordingly. His girlhood at that time was a year older than himself.

"I wonder," Emma mused, "if he has ever come across his mother's copy of this contract, for she doubtless had a copy. I wonder where he is and what is his world's work. If he is as nice as he was eight or nine years ago."

She folded the contract and was about to toss it into a heap of papers to be burned when she changed her mind and, having closed the trunk, took it to her room and locked it in her writing desk.

Emma Cunningham found it difficult to break up her past associations and continued to live on as she was from day to day, month to month. Half a year later she was sitting by the window sewing when a strange young man came up the walk and rang the doorbell. Then a maid brought in a card bearing the name of Edwin Forbes. Being received by Miss Cunningham, he spoke to her in a constrained manner and with great formality.

"I believe, Miss Cunningham, that your mother and my mother years ago were friends. Since I was to pass through this place, my mother asked me to learn something about your family. She is desirous to learn if your mother is still living and how situated."

"My mother died several months ago," Emma replied.

"Indeed? Mother will be pained to hear of her death. Though separated for a number of years from her friend, she has never forgotten her."

"I have heard my mother speak of Mrs. Forbes quite often," replied the girl. "I think your family were here when you were a boy of about four years."

"That sojourn here was very brief. After we went away again mother tells me that she and Mrs. Cunningham drifted apart from each other. Singular, isn't it, how persons who have been intimate pass completely out of each other's lives?"

"Very." Mr. Forbes arose, assured Miss Cunningham that he was very glad to meet her again and that his mother would be pleased to hear of her, though she would be grieved to hear of her friend's death. Miss Cunningham replied in equally courteous terms, asked Mr. Forbes how long he would remain in the town and when he said he would not likely get away for several days asked him to call again. With this he bowed himself out.

He had no sooner gone than Emma gave herself up to wondering. Did he know anything about the contract their mothers had made? Had his mother remembered it? Had she ever said anything to him about it?

Emma received a letter from Mrs. Forbes' mothering with her upon the loss of her mother and regretting the loss of her own friend. The missive expressed a good deal of feeling. The writer explained that her son had not called again on Miss Cunningham because his stay was unexpectedly short.

This explanation did not alter Miss Cunningham's opinion that she had no special attraction for Mr. Forbes, and she sighed as she folded his mother's letter and put it back in its envelope. An implicit romance appeared to have been spoiled. Edwin Forbes had not appeared to advantage, being evidently constrained. Nevertheless he was a fine looking fellow and bore the stamp of character on his face. Miss Cunningham was disappointed that he had not been pleased with her. Had he been the reverse she surely would have seen him again before his departure.

What was her surprise one morning to receive a letter from her mother's old friend containing an invitation for a visit. She was thrown by it into a state of perplexity. If her sojourn there should be a part of a romance she would love to go; if she were simply to go as the daughter of the host's former intimate friend it would be distasteful to her. Would Edwin be at home during the period of her visit, and if so would he treat her with the same constrained formality as during his call upon her, which he had made simply at his mother's request to inquire about her old friend?

Miss Cunningham deferred replying to the invitation as long as she could do so without appearing unkindly of it, then wrote that it would give her great pleasure to accept it, introducing into her acceptance several "ifs" which were really intended to give her an opportunity for backing out in case she found it difficult to bring herself to the scratch when the time came for the visit.

That time arrived in the autumn. It was October when she reached Mrs. Forbes' home and was received by that lady. Edwin did not appear to welcome the guest. His mother said nothing about him ill dinner was served, then said she regretted that her son was not at home. He had gone hunting, but she hoped that he would return before Emma's departure.

If anything were decided to indicate that a possible romance Miss Cunningham had been building up in her heart was of air castle material it was this announcement that he was to be absent the young man intended to be absent in order that she might tell his mother that she must go home the day before his return. Mrs. Forbes expressed a polite regret at this and turned the conversation to another subject.

The day set for Mr. Forbes' return was a Saturday, and Emma had announced her intention to go home on Friday. Wednesday brought the rumor. His mother expressed surprise at his cutting short his stay, and when she asked for the cause he told her that he had not found game worthy of his attention.

The young huntsman, fresh from the woods and out of door living, looked rugged and handsome, and his very indifference made him all the more attractive to her. Nothing was said about Emma's return on the coming Friday, but on Thursday Mrs. Forbes begged her to remain longer, since she wished to invite a few friends to meet her and had not offered her this attention before on account of the absence of her son. Emma consented to defer her departure.

Shortly before the arrival of the guests Edwin Forbes came downstairs in evening dress, meeting Emma in the lower hall, also in appropriate costume. Neither could conceal an expression of admiration for the other. We condemn, among other extravagant gauds, expensive costumes; but, after all, a fondness for fine clothes is a natural proclivity to be found in both sexes.

Anyway, this first sight of each other under admirable conditions broke the ice between them. Edwin Forbes during the evening divided his attentions among his guests, but whenever he came in contact with Miss Cunningham there was a recurrence of that look he had given her when he met her on coming downstairs. Then when the other guests had gone they must needs talk over the gathering, and Mrs. Forbes went upstairs.

Nothing more was said about Miss Cunningham's departure for several days. Then when she spoke of going Mrs. Forbes suggested that she finish out the week to which she consented at Edwin Forbes was brought to him in the evening and he himself to his mother's guest. Emma at times felt back into the belief that this devotion was only in deference to his mother as a hostess, but in the main she had every reason to believe that it pleased him to please his mother.

When Miss Cunningham returned to her lonely home it seemed to her that she could not remain there. What the effect of her presence at the Forbes residence was may be judged from the fact that, Edwin endured her absence for three days, then took a train for the place where she lived.

As may be expected, the couple became engaged. Edwin proposed one evening while they were sitting by the firelight in Miss Cunningham's cozy living room. Miss Cunningham had for some time been expecting the demonstration and anti-fated great delight in the realization of the plan that had been conceived by two mother cronies twenty years before. Her anxiety for the engagement was because she wished to show her lover how he had failed into a plan which seemed to have been forgotten by his mother, for Emma felt assured that if Mrs. Forbes remembered the contract she had made she had never mentioned it to her son. At any rate, he had not shown any signs of being cognizant of it.

As soon as the proposition was made and accepted Emma was eager to reveal to her betrothed that he as well as she had been enacting a romance. Excusing herself for a moment, she ran upstairs and, returning with the contract, handed it to him, waiting for an expression of happy surprise. Glancing at it, he did express surprise, but not as expected. His astonishment was that she had known of the contract. Thrusting his hand into his coat pocket, he drew forth its duplicate.

"Did your mother give it to you?" asked Emma, disappointed.

"No! I found it among old papers in the garret. Mother has no remembrance of it."

"After all," said Emma rather to herself than to her lover, "it is a romance."

"You mean a put up job on both sides," was the rejoinder. But he made amends for his brutal remark by an avalanche of kisses.

ABOUT TIMBER FLUMES.

Those of V Shape More Efficient Than the Square Sided Form.

That the V shaped timber flume is a more efficient type than the box or square sided form is one of the conclusions reached by the department of agriculture in a bulletin recently issued on flumes and fluming. The V shaped wooden flume requires less water and on the average less repairs than the other type, is better adapted to set as a slide on steep grades and offers fewer chances for jams. Concerning a third type, the "sectional" metal flume, semicircular in form, the prediction is made that it will come into wide use. Such a flume is strong and light and can be quickly taken apart and transported from one place to another to be set up again.

For handling railroad ties, poles, cordwood and the like a flume with the sides of the V thirty inches in height is large enough. For handling logs, piling, long timber or braked sawed timber a height of from forty to sixty inches is recommended. The best angle for the V is put at ninety degrees.

Proposed flume flumes ought to be conveyed as carefully as a line for a log flume should be kept below 15 per cent wherever possible, and the best results are obtained with grades between 2 and 10 per cent.

Abrupt curves in a flume should be avoided, for they are likely to cause jams. Curves should rarely be permitted to exceed twenty degrees. It may be necessary to blast out rocks and bowlders, or projecting points of bluffs, or to trestle or even tunnel to eliminate abrupt curves or maintain an even grade.

A flume recently built on Hoehat creek, near St. Joe, Ind., is cited as a good example of modern V shaped flume construction. This flume, which is unusually large and built to handle heavy logs and long timbers, is said to have cost approximately $8,000 per mile for the five miles of its length. Including the cost of constructing a wagon road and telephone equipment. Other flumes are cited costing from $2,000 to $7,500 a mile.

To Harden Concrete.

A new hardening material just introduced in England for use with concrete consists of 95 per cent of iron dust, or iron flour. From fifteen to twenty-five pounds of material to 100 pounds of dry cement is the proportion used, and the addition of two parts of sand to this mixture makes the top coat, applied to a thickness of about one inch. This top dressing when applied to a floor is said to make it hard and durable, waterproof and not slippery. It is claimed also that this material is valuable where new concrete is placed next to old concrete, making it adhere firmly.

Electric Blue Printing.

A new lighting apparatus for blue printing and copying that has been brought out in Germany consists of an electric arc with a reflector so shaped that the light is thrown downward with equal intensity over every part of the illuminating area. The purpose of the apparatus is the making of blue prints that will be of uniform color throughout.

WHEN CUTTING SCREWS.

Some Useful Rules as to the Best Methods of Procedure.

Rule for cutting a screw in an engine lathe: In cutting V thread screws it is only necessary to practice operating the slipper and slide screw handle of your lathe before cutting. After having done this, until you get the motions, you may set the point of the tool as high as the center, and if you keep the tool sharp you will find no difficulty in cutting screws. You must, however, cut very light chips, using scrapers in finishing, and must take it out of the lathe often and look at it from both sides very carefully to see that the threads do not lean like fish scales. After cutting polish with a stick and some emery and oil.

Rule for cutting square thread screws: Always get the depth required with a tool somewhat thinner than one-half the pitch of the thread. After doing this make another tool exactly the pitch of the thread and use it to finish with, cutting a slight chip on each side of the groove. After doing this polish with a fine stick and some emery. Square threads for strength should be cut one-half the depth of their pitch, while a square thread for wear should be cut three-fourths the depth of their pitch.

Rule for mongrel or half V half square threads: These are usually made for great wear and should be cut the depth of their pitch, and for extraordinary wear they may be cut one and a half the depth of the pitch. The point and the bottom of the groove should be within one-quarter the depth of their pitch. What is meant here by the point of the thread is the outside surface, and the bottom of the groove is the groove between threads. Cutting these threads it is proper to use a tool the shape of the thread and in thickness about one-fifth less than the thread is when finished. It is impossible to cut the whole surface at once. You will cut it in depth about one-sixteenth at a time, then a chip of the sides of the thread, and continue in this way alternately till you have arrived at the depth required. Make a gauge of the size required between the thread and flush by scraping with water. It is usually best to leave such screws as these a little large until after they are cut and then turn off a light chip in size them. This leaves them true and nice.—Blacksmith and Wheelwright.

Production of Tripoli.

The production of tripoli and of diatomaceous earth in 1913 was the largest in the history of the industry, being valued at $285,821, more than twice as much as that of the year previous, when it amounted to $125,446. The amount of tripoli produced in 1913 was 20,797 short tons, valued at $216,581, and that of diatomaceous earth 6,586 short tons, valued at $69,240. Tripoli is used as an abrasive and for other purposes, but much of it is used in the manufacture of filters. It is also used as paint, wood filler, metal polish, in soaps, in cleansers and for making glass and facing foundry molds. Diatomaceous earth is used as an abrasive in the form of polishing powders and scouring soaps. Lately it has been found to be valuable in the manufacture of dynamite, as an insulating packing material for safes, steam pipes and boilers and as a fire-proof building material.—United States Geological Survey.

Fan Operated by Heat.

Working without electricity or springs, a fan has been constructed for home and office use which produces a pleasant, cool breeze without noise and at an operating cost of one-half cent an hour. Motive power is generated by the rapid expansion of hot air. Each stroke of a small piston forces air into a cylinder, where by the heat of an alcohol flame it is expanded, developing sufficient force to drive the fan blades with speed. The stand is slightly less than one and one-half feet high and weighs eight pounds. It can be moved from one position to another without trouble and the fan is claimed, will run without need of repairs or danger of getting out of order.

Lignite in Montana.

As the northeastern part of Montana is barren of timber, except along some of the larger streams, a supply of fuel other than wood is all important for the ranches of this section. According to a recent report by the United States geological survey, thin beds of lignite are exposed along the valley of Poplar river near Seeley, from which enough fuel may be obtained for local use in the vicinity of Plentywood. In the valley of Big Muddy creek, the beds of lignite are much thicker and contain an amount of lignite sufficient not only for the needs of the ranches in that vicinity, but also for shipment to other places as the population increases.

Danger in Metallic Tapes.

Surveyors on railroads operated by third rail should use metallic tapes with discretion or avoid their use entirely. While danger of contact with the third rail is imminent, the more frequent accidents seem to arise from leaning such tapes between the rails while trains pass over. These tapes are often picked up by the armatures of the motors, particularly where rear less motors are used, with resulting damage to property. Electrical Rail Road Journal.

Conditions for long distance wireless work are more favorable on the Pacific ocean than on the Atlantic, where the underlying rocks are thought to interfere with transmission.

LIFE AND LONGEVITY.

Simply Prolonging One's Days on Earth Is Not Real Living.

What really constitutes life? Is it action, or is it merely existence? Who is the more useful, the man who gives his all in energy to service or he who conserves his forces and thereby prolongs his days? He lives most who accomplishes most. Activity in useful, productive or constructive effort is the real test of life. Length of years may content some, but restless, energetic souls will press forward, regardless of time, striving for a goal they may never attain, but always striving, and those only really live.

Life insurance presidents, being interested in the prolongation of existence of risks, bend their efforts to the teaching of elements of living, the avoidance of excesses, exposures or unnecessary risks of any kind and in this way really serve the world because they increase the productive years of man.

As a result of modern methods man really lives longer and better, but this is not the all in all of life. "To live is to be active, to have a part in the creative effort of mankind, regardless of whether the span be long or short, so long as it is busy, for 'an end is an end, whether it cometh on the winched heels of a week or the dull stretch of a century."—Omaha Bee.

STRUGGLES OF AN ARTIST.

Story of the Peasant Painter Millet and "The Angelus."

It was only after long years of struggle and dire poverty, through which Millet was consoled and supported by his wife, that the peasant painter was able to take the three roomed cottage at Barbizon and "try to do something really good."

It was then that he began to paint that most beautiful poem of poverty, "The Angelus," which is today one of the most valuable pictures in the world. Again and again he threw aside the picture in despair of ever finishing it to his satisfaction, and as often his wife replaced it on the easel and induced him to continue.

On one occasion he was so incensed at not being able to produce a certain effect that he seized a knife and would have destroyed the canvas and ended the matter once for all had not his wife fortunately seized his hand and induced him to give the picture another trial.

Thus it was that at last "The Angelus" played a part on the walls of the Louvre. The success it won encouraged Millet to paint many more pictures and thus place himself among the immortals in art.

The Uncomfortable Part.

deliberately drew her aside. My hot hand clasped hers and found it as cold as ice and trembling.

"For God's sake," I whispered hoarsely to my humbleness, "may that you forgive me?"

She did not speak for many seconds. Then her voice was very low and tremulous. I felt that her somber eyes were accusing me even as they tried to meet my own with a steadiness that was meant to be reassuring.

"Of course I forgive you," she said. "You have been so good to me."

"Good?" I cried bitterly. "I've been harsh, unreasoning, supercilious from the day I met!"

"Hush!" she said, laying her free hand upon my arm. "I shall never forget all that you have done for me. I—I can say no more."

I gulped. "I pray to heaven that you may be happy, Alice—happier than any one else in the world."

She lowered her head suddenly, and I was made more miserable than before.

"Say that you forgive me."

LIGHT FOR RAILWAY GATE.

Automatically Changes Color When Barrier Is Lowered or Raised.

An exceedingly simple device that causes the light on a crossing gate to show red when the gate is down and white when the gate is up is being installed at grade crossings on the Lehigh Valley railroad.

This device consists simply of a red bullseye, which is fixed to the gate in such a way that the red glass is immediately in front of the point where the lantern hangs when the gate is down. As the gate comes down the lantern, which has been showing white, swings behind the bullseye and shows red. As the gate is raised it swings from behind the bullseye and shows white. Since the lanterns are all white there is never any danger of confusing the engineer of the train by red lights.

Coal Mining in Pennsylvania.

Anthracite mining began between 1790 and 1800, when a small quantity was produced for local consumption. To the close of 1913 the production of anthracite had amounted to 2,184,554, 600 long tons or 2,146,865,000 short tons. The first records of the production of bituminous coal in Pennsylvania cover the year 1840, when 161,826 short tons were mined. The output of bituminous coal from 1840 to the close of 1913 has amounted to 2,731,315,000 short tons, from which it appears that the total production of bituminous coal in Pennsylvania now exceeds that of anthracite by over 500,000 tons.—United States Geological Survey.

Feed the bull a liberal allowance of alfalfa hay, now and then a little clover and timothy hay as a relish or a change. A mixture consisting of 200 pounds of bran, 200 pounds of ground oats, 200 pounds of corn and 50 pounds of alfalfa will supplement the roughage very nicely. Feed enough of this mixture to keep the animal in good physical condition, which will not mean a good deal if the alfalfa hay is of good quality.

DEFINITION OF A COUNTY AGENT

Question Seems to be Misunderstood in Some Localities

Chief Work is to Instruct Farmers in Best Agricultural Methods.

A county agent is a man of practical farm experience with an agricultural education, working under the joint direction of the farmers, the state agricultural college and the United States department of agriculture. His chief work is to assist in determining the best agricultural practices for the county in which he is located. The county agent is often referred to as a "common carrier of good ideas," these ideas not always his own, but such as he has picked up in his work among the farmers in the county.

A county agent draws a salary of from $1200 to $2100, according to the calibre of the man, and his traveling expenses are paid. The total cost ranges from $2000 to $3000 a year. To meet this expense the board of supervisors annually make an appropriation to cover the county's share of the cost. The agricultural college pays $600 and the United States department of agriculture pays $600, that is, the county is given outside aid to the amount of $100 per month for the support of the agent and the farm bureau. In one case in Michigan the county's share of the expense is raised by donations and subscriptions from the farmers and business men. As the work of the county agent is of general benefit, however, an appropriation by the board of supervisors seems to be the most equitable way of distributing the cost. The counties which have agents look on the appropriation not as a tax upon the county's resources, but as an investment which will give good returns.

Going back to the first definition of a county agent, we see that he is not merely a successful farmer, nor, on the other hand, is he a young, inexperienced college man, but an attempt is always made to find a person for county agent who combines in himself the experience of actual farm operations and the scientific and theoretical training of an agricultural college. It is true that a few of the county agents in Michigan went directly from college to their work at the head of a county farm bureau, but these were mature men, born and brought up on farms and familiar with every detail of farming. Such a person is the present hustling agent in Marquette county. Others of the agents, like C. B. Cook of Allegan and Jason Woodman of Kalamazoo, were for years actively engaged in managing their own farms and only gave up farming when called to their present positions.

As an officer in the United States department of agriculture the county agent is vested with certain police powers which enable him to establish and maintain quarantine in case of an outbreak of dangerous contagious diseases like cholera, blackleg, and hoof and mouth disease. In French county, where the government made an attempt to stamp out hog cholera, the county agent was the one who organized the farmers for the campaign.

The agent is also a member of the extension department of the Agricultural College and he has the right to call upon any expert in the college to assist in solving difficult problems in his county. For example, if a farmer has a difficult drainage problem on his farm he first calls in the county agent, who, in turn, if he cannot give a satisfactory solution, calls for a drainage expert from the college. The expert will proceed to make a survey, establish drainage levels and do all that is necessary. Then the state foots the bill and the farmer is saved the costs of professional services.

In our original definition we also said that the county agent worked under the direction of the farmers. County agents do not force their services on anyone, but if the farmers in a county feel the need of help, advice and suggestions from someone who has had a broader farm experience and who has enjoyed the advantages of scientific instruction in agriculture, the county agent is the person to whom they may go.

The county agent will investigate the causes of poor crops if asked to do so. He will know where to secure improved varieties of seed, better fertilizers and the newest machinery. He will give the tuberculin test to cattle, vaccinate calves against blackleg, and help treat hogs to prevent hog cholera. He always helps with the county institutes and in some places he teaches agriculture in the normal training classes. In concrete language, the county agent is the hired man for the farmers of a county.

The question is sometimes asked if Charlevoix county is ready for an agent. Of course she is ready and she has been ready for years without knowing it. Some of the most prosperous counties, like Kent, Lenawee, Kalamazoo and Allegan, have agents and are growing more prosperous as the result. On the other hand, six upper peninsula counties, where mining and lumbering are still the chief industries, have hired agents in order that the oncoming area of agriculture may be started right. Of course Charlevoix is ready. No county in Michigan need fear that an agent can be secured too soon.

WILL SOLVE SEED CORN PROBLEM

Charlevoix Business Men to Assist Farmers in Securing Supply.

Little, if any, of Last Year's Crop Fit for Plant—See the Committee.

This year there appears to be a great shortage in seed corn nearly everywhere. On account of the early frosts but little corn ripened last fall. By a general and thorough canvass of the situation it is found there is very little corn in Charlevoix county that will test out as being desirable to use for seed. Everyone not having seed to plant next spring should now begin to make arrangements to get their corn and not wait until later, when there may not be any in the market.

In view of this condition Semmel J. Bailey of the Belvedere resort and the firm of S. M. See & Sons have started a fund to assist in helping secure and furnish seed to the farmers in this community. A committee composed of W. J. Rachow, A. F. Bridge, W. H. Miller and A. A. Swinton have the matter in charge. The committee is now making inquiry as to where good corn for seed can be obtained and the cost of same delivered. They have the matter well in hand and can be of considerable assistance to those desiring corn for planting.

The committee is anxious to know of

GOOD RESULTS RECEIVED FROM FARMERS' INSTITUTES

Farmer Enthusiastic About County Agent Movement and Cow-Testing Association ---Claims State Speaker's Advice Saved $100.00--- Association Officers Elected.

That the farmers of Charlevoix county are not slow in supporting any movement for the promotion of better farming was shown during farmers' institute week. In spite of bad weather conditions, the one-day meetings were well attended, over 1300 people being present at the sessions. Many dairy farmers expressed their willingness to join a cow-testing association as soon as one could be organized. At each meeting also the question of a county agricultural agent was raised and practically everyone thought that Charlevoix county should get in line with the other twenty-one counties which have agents. At Deer Lake the enthusiasm for a county agent was greatest and the institute officers were requested to prepare a petition to the board of supervisors for an appropriation for this purpose. Many signers were secured.

It is encouraging to institute officers and the state speakers alike to know that farmers are being benefited in a financial way by the farmers' institutes. Everyone appreciates the inspirational value of the work, but a few people are found who doubt the real practical good of the institutes. After one of the addresses on handling green manure crops a man who is himself a manual and up-to-date farmer was heard to say that he fully believed that the speaker's advice would save him $100 this spring. More of this sort of comment might serve to draw out to the meetings some of the self-satisfied ones who never attend an institute, but who seldom fail anyone who has not arranged for seed and will be glad to have a chance to talk it over and find out just how much to order. You will do well to see any of these men and have the amount required placed with the shipment they will soon receive. They propose to furnish seed corn to everyone needing it who will make their wants known. See some member of the committee at once.

THEATRICAL

"The Bargain" is the title of the famous Paramount feature picture at the Majestic, Friday, February 25th. The story is full of typical western life, depicting the career of a bandit, Jim Stokes, the "Two-Gun Man," who robs a coach and in making his daring escape is wounded. He makes his way to a spring, where he falls unconscious. Nell Brent and her father find the bandit and take him to their home, where Nell nurses him back to health. Later he and Nell are married without her knowing his identity. He becomes conscience-stricken and starts to return the stolen money. Upon entering town he discovers $1000 reward for his capture, is recognized and again escapes, only to be captured later in a saloon and gambling house.

The sheriff, attracted by the rivalry below, goes downstairs and loses the stolen money playing cards. He tells Jim the outlaw. They agree that Jim is to go free if he returns the money. Jim arms himself, holds up the cashier and again escapes, being hotly pursued. He finally returns to the sheriff with the money just ahead of the searching party. He is taken from town by the sheriff next day and allowed two hours' start of the sheriff. He returns for his wife and together they go across the border to escape the law and start life anew.

Tuesday, February 23, the Paramount picture will be "The Ghost Breaker." It is a thrilling story of love and adventure. A large castle forms the main thrills in the picture, this being the place where the climax and finale take place.

to knock the movement as a waste of money.

At a business meeting of the county institute February 6th at Ironton the following officers were elected for the ensuing year:

President—D. E. Ingalls.
Secretary—H. L. Barnum.
Vice-presidents:
Bay—Henry Arnold.
Boyer Valley—Frank House.
Charlevoix—Nathan Burns.
Chandler—James Milford.
Hayes—E. E. Stroud.
Hudson—Frank Davis.
Marion—William Withers.
Melrose—Clyde Kent.
Eveline—E. H. Clark.
Evangelina—W. F. Tindall.
Norwood—Thomas Cummings.
South Arm—Nathan Liskum.
Wilson—John Newville.
Beaver Island—H. P. Boyle.

The question of where the county institute is to be held next year is still in the air. Marion, Ironton, Deer Lake and Boyne Falls are anxious to secure this two-day institute. The location will be settled at the summer meeting of county officers and it will probably go to the community where the most support can be expected.

On account of bad weather the attendance at the various one day meetings is not fairly indicative of the spirit of the community, but the figures are given for other reasons: Ironton, two days, 513; Marion, one day, 153; Maple Grove, 45; Pine Lake, 78; Deer Lake, 259; Clarion, 224; Springville, 80.

THREE GAMES ARE SCHEDULED

Big Doings Among the Basketball Players Friday Night.

Harbor Springs, Petoskey and Central Lake Teams To Play Local Teams.

What promises to be one of the lively encounters of the local basketball schedule will be staged at the rink on Friday evening, when Harbor Springs couples up with the local quintet in the third game of the season. Each team has one game to its credit. The local men will be in the best shape of the season and are out to redeem themselves for the game lost at Harbor early in the month. As an opener of the big show the Petoskey high team will be matched against the Charlevoix high. The local high men have already went down before Petoskey's fast five, but are positive of a turn in the tables. The Central Lake girls team will also be here for a game with the Charlevoix girls, who are fast rounding into a snappy team.

This is the biggest card that the local management has ever booked for one night, but local enthusiasm and support warrants this action. Everybody should be out early in order to take in all three games. The first 1 be called at 7:15 sharp.

Auction Sales.

The present outlook is that there will be the usual number of auction sales held in the vicinity of Charlevoix this spring. As usual, they will be found advertised in the Courier, the paper whose circulation covers 90 per cent. of Charlevoix rural routes and Banks township in Antrim county. This issue contains two sales, and for next week's issue two have already been booked, with others pending.

Monday, February 23, Mrs. Thomas Wardrop will sell at public auction all stock, farm implements and a considerable amount of household goods at her farm, 14 miles south of Charlevoix, on the Norwood road. Sale commences at 1:00 o'clock. W. E. Byers, auctioneer. Read the advertisement on page 2.

Thursday, March 2, Mrs. Nellie Connor will have a sale on what is known as the Nat. Burns farm, three miles south of Charlevoix. A number of horses, cows and other stock, as well as a quantity of farm implements, will be sold. The sale starts at 10 a. m. and a free lunch will be served. W. E. Byers, auctioneer; J. H. Bugbee, clerk. Read the adv. on page 3.

EAGLE PATROLS WIN

Prove too Fast a Bunch of Players for Central Lake Team.

The Eagle-Patrol basketball team of Charlevoix defeated the Central Lake Scouts, Saturday, February 19, by the score of 31 to 16. The score does not indicate the evenness of the two teams, Central Lake having a trifle the edge on team work but much poorer than the Eagles in basket throwing. Many times they would get the ball right under their basket and then be unable to score.

Many pronounced this game the best so far this season outside of the Independent and High School games. One reason because of the almost wholly absence of fouling, but nine fouls being made during the entire game, four by the Eagles and five by Central Lake.

Hampton starred for the winners, Cameron for the losers. The Eagles play at Petoskey next Saturday.

STATE REWARD MONEY

Charlevoix County Receives $1,091 in Excess of Money Paid to State.

Since 1903, when the state reward law went into effect, seventeen of the twenty western Michigan counties have received more from the state in rewards than they have paid out in taxes for roads, as follows: Antrim, $21,296; Benzie, $29,690; Charlevoix, $1,091; Emmet, $8,773; Grand Traverse, $20,584; Kalamazoo, $17,711; Lake, $1,184; Manistee, $20,591; Mason, $21,040; Mecosta, $24,420; Missaukee, $13,619; Montcalm, $9,554; Muskegon, $32,527; Newaygo, $18,876; Oceana, $49,331; Osceola, $8,987; Wexford, $26,934.

FARMERS' WEEK AT THE M. A. C.

Michigan Farmers Will Attend in Large Numbers.

Program to be of Great Interest to Tillers of Soil—Noted Speakers Booked.

February 28th to March 4th will be "Home Coming" week for Michigan farmers at the Agricultural College and a program which will interest everyone has been prepared.

What will really be "short courses" have been arranged by the different departments, and the lectures, demonstrations and laboratory work will supply a fund of useful practical information upon the various subjects.

The departments of soils and farm crops will provide a course throughout the week, in which methods of handling soils of various types will be discussed. Especial attention will be paid to bringing up the fertility of depleted soils, the use of lime and commercial fertilizers, and the growing of sweet clover, soy beans and other soil-improving crops, as well as some of the more important money crops. There will also be practical exercises in soil testing and in judging corn and the smaller grains.

The departments of dairying and animal husbandry will discuss the selection, breeding and feeding of the various classes of farm animals. Exercises will also be given in stock judging.

The division of veterinary science will also provide a course in which the nature of some of the more common diseases of live stock will be discussed and treatments and remedies suggested. Particular attention will be given to lectures on "Emergency Methods" and "Emergency Medicines."

The poultry department will be assisted by W. H. Card of Connecticut, the well-known writer and lecturer upon topics relating to poultry, who will give two addresses each day, as well as an illustrated address upon one evening. The course will cover all phases of the subject, from breeds and housing to feeding, killing and marketing.

The course by the horticultural department will include lectures and demonstrations in the more important orchard operations, such as grafting, pruning, spraying, tillage, harvesting and marketing the crop. Attention will also be paid to the growing of several of the leading truck crops. The importance of standardizing the potato industry and giving more attention to seed selection, fertilization and the control of various diseases will have attention.

WASHINGTON-LINCOLN BANQUET

Given by Charlevoix Historical Society a Great Success.

Unusually Fine Program Brought Out Large Crowd—Events of the Evening.

The Washington-Lincoln banquet of the Charlevoix Historical Society was held at the Masonic Hall, Friday evening, February 18th, with the usual large attendance.

The music of the high school orchestra announced the opening of the banquet hall, where in America's finest setting, the grand old Stars and Stripes, adorning every wall, handsomely decorated tables, beautified by lighted candles, were inviting all to the evening feast. Under the shadow of the country's flag the speakers found true protection, while its noble companion, the G. A. R., was a convincing proof that all was well. A tantalizing reminder of Washington were the healthy young trees with veritable cherries, while carved figures of Washington and his hatchet hovered safely around. Miniature sections of rail fence, results of Lincoln's industry, with figures of the "rail splitter," interpreted the meaning of the evening.

Following the benediction by Rev. C. E. Taggart, with "Buenos Aires" and all good cheer the feast was ushered in. "Good things end that more may come."

The evening's program:

Vocal Selection—Male Quartette.

"Tenting on the Old Camp Ground" was most inspiringly sung by Messrs. Block, Dolberg, Smith and Shapton.

Welcome Address—Dr. A. M. Wilkinson, president.

With a short resume of what the Historical Society stood for.

Vocal Solo—Miss Irene Finucan.

Two numbers from the "Cyclo of Life," "Summer" and "Autumn," were most beautifully rendered and greatly enjoyed.

Some original verses, "Charlevoix the Beautiful," by Mr. Brayton Saltonstall, called forth a great deal of applause.

Vocal Solo—Dr. F. H. Wilkinson.

"Hark, Hark, to the Lark at Heaven's Gate," as usual, offered a great treat to the society.

Address, "Lincoln"—Prof. J. H. Kaya. Lincoln as a genius, not in the ordinary acceptance of the word, but applicable to all phases of his life, was the line presented. A greatly appreciated and splendid address.

Vocal Solo—Mr. Glenn Dolberg. "At the Bottom of the Blue Sea" was a perfect closing to the evening's program.

For the ingenious and beautiful decorations of the executive committee and to the Eastern Star ladies, who served the fine supper, with the kindness of those who responded to the musical program, the society was indebted for a delightful evening.

MRS. ROLLO LONG DEAD

Well Known North Bay Resident Passed Away in Hospital Last Thursday.

Mrs. Rollo Long, a well known resident of North Bay, died in the Petoskey hospital last Thursday, where she had been taken for treatment.

Some time ago she suffered a stroke of paralysis, and was taken to the hospital for treatment. On the morning of her death she was taken by another stroke, which resulted in her death during the afternoon.

Deceased was born at Horton Bay, August 13, 1878. She attended the schools there and was married at the home of her parents, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Long, to Rollo Long of North Bay, September 1, 1897. Practically all her life was spent near Horton Bay, where she enjoyed the confidence and respect of the entire community. She leaves her husband and seven children.

Funeral services were held from the home Saturday at 10:00 o'clock. Rev. G. A. Weaver of Petoskey officiating. Interment in North Bay cemetery.

409 Autos in County

Charlevoix is not slow when it comes to the number of automobiles owned in the county. Recent figures taken from registrations shows that the county has 409 automobiles, divided among the following makes: Buick 22, Dodge 1, Ford 215, Hudson 6, Maxwell 5, Overland 37, Reo 20, and Studebaker 23. It estimated by local dealers the these figures will be at least a third more at the end of 1916.

Teachers Must Be Citizens of United States

Michigan Law Provides That No Certificate Can Be Granted to Those Who Are Not.

An interesting provision in the state laws enacted at the session of 1915, which is not generally known, provides that no certificate to teach in the public school of Michigan shall be granted to a teacher who is not a citizen of the United States.

Under section 5 of Act 7 to provide for the election of the county commissioner of schools, for the appointment of school examiners and to define the duties fix the compensation for the same, this provision is found:

"That no certificate shall be granted under the provisions of this act, to any person who, having arrived at the age of twenty-one years, is not a citizen of the United States."

The influence of this provision probably will be widespread throughout the state. Naturally school officers in employing teachers and instructors are bound to accept only those who have been duly authorized to teach and have certificates indicating that fact and the lack of citizenship may be a bar to persons otherwise qualified to act as instructors.

In the copper country especially will its influence be felt. It will bar from teachers' certificates, children not born in the United States, whose fathers have neglected to become naturalized citizens prior to their becoming of age. There probably are several such in the high school and normals.

The lack of these certificates will bar the person from employment as a teacher. Although in the employment of teachers, the local school officers have tried first to give the preference to local teachers who are qualified, the lack of citizenship is likely to stand as a bar to such action in the future.

NIGHTS OF UNREST

No Sleep, No Rest, No Peace With a Lame or Aching Back.

Wear the lot of many a kidney sufferer. Pain and distress from morn to night. Get up with a lame back. Twinges of backache bother you all day. Dull aching breaks your rest at night. Urinary disorders add to your misery. If you have kidney trouble, Reach the cause—the kidneys. Doan's Kidney Pills are for the kidneys only—Have made an enviable reputation in Charlevoix.

J. B. Lancaster, 203 May street, Charlevoix, says: "I suffered for seven years from weak kidneys. My back ached at night and when I got up in the morning, I was stiff and lame. The kidney secretions passed too frequently and my rest was broken. I got Doan's Kidney Pills at the Ivy Drug Store and they did me a world of good. I can rest better at night, my back is stronger and the aches and pains are gone."

Price 50c. at all dealers. Don't simply ask for a kidney remedy—get Doan's Kidney Pills—the same that Mr. Lancaster had. Foster-Nilburn Co., Props., Buffalo, N. Y.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surface of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. Mrs. James P. O'Brien, Mrs. A. Price and daughter, Ruth, were visitors at the school Monday.

Monday, February 14, was not only Valentine's birthday but the birthday of Alexander Winick also. We had planned a valentine box for the afternoon and about three o'clock, Mrs. Winick appeared at the school with the most glorious surprise in the form of a luncheon. The chief feature being a large birthday cake which was lighted with fourteen candles. It is needless to say we did justice to it and went home wishing Valentine's day came every Monday.

School Commissioner's Notes

No notes last week. The commissioner was attending the farmers' institute, driving through the drifts, hearing some splendid programs, speechifying a little bit herself, and enjoying potluck twice daily.

There was splendid substance in the course this year; just how a farmer may judge what his soil needs without scientific test; how he may supply this by proper planting without relying on commercial fertilizers; why Michigan should lead the world in stock raising; just why milk testing pays, and that a movement is actually on foot to procure a county agent for Charlevoix county. Hurrah for the county agent. Join the boosters' fast increasing crowd!

ment. All the school board has do is to welcome this expert and to be open to conviction.

The Inest Teachers' Institute ever was! Large attendance, earnest speakers, and courteous, attentive listeners. Prea. Bryan of Colgate University was popular as a man of fine delivery and deep thought. Prea. Kaye is a master of details and has a way that wins and keeps winning. The Palmer instructor, Miss Dickson, was very practical in her work and lives up to her nickname, the whirlwind. She was less practical but none the less popular in fortune telling. Supt. L. L. Tyler of Traverse City came in at the last moment with a new breath of enthusiasm from without and the interest could not possibly have flagged on that crucial morning. He's a capital hand at story telling too, with a fund of beautiful truths bound up in compelling poetry.

One hundred eight plates set at the Teachers' Supper. Supt. Holliday was truthfully master of merry-making and handed the slams nee compliments right and left. That was rather hard on those East Jordan teachers, but he gives them a year to recover.

Watch for the resolutions of the Charlevoix County Teachers' Association. They are bound to appear.

New drinking fountains expected to arrive soon at Horton Bay and Barnard schools. One more barrier between children and disease.

A number of teachers and parents regret the loss of a leader in the spring activities of Rural School Athletic League. Why couldn't each township have the meet just the same? The teachers of each township could arrange by phone or correspondence. That's easy and the banners don't cost much. A popcorn stand would pay for them. Then after you have them they mean a whole lot.

February 22-26 the commissioner will be in Detroit attending the meeting of the National Educational Association. She hopes to gain some idea or suggestion that may later be used in Charlevoix County to aid in putting our schools on the American map. For this reason she cannot be in Boyne City on the 26th as previously announced. Any difficulty will be arranged by correspondence or by a later visit.

No notes in the next issue. More yet thereafter. Therefore rejoice and be exceeding glad for great will be the thereof.

Moved by Alderman Cartier and seconded by Ald. See that the report as read be accepted and the mayor and city clerk be authorized to issue warrants on the city depositories for $1,022.48 and the clerk be instructed to draw orders on the various funds for the amount of each respective bill. Motion carried by the following aye and nay vote: Ayes, Cartier, Priest, See, Carey and Geiken. Nays, none.

Ald. Priest seconded by Ald. Carey moved the adoption of the following aye and nay vote.

Resolved, by the common council of the City of Charlevoix that the grading and paving of State street with Tarryu Macdonald street to the south line of Antirum street south to the south line of Harbut avenue thirty-six (36) feet in width and from the south line of Park avenue south to the south line of Antirum street, as follows: A parking sixteen (16) feet in width between Park avenue and the alley parallel to and between Park avenue and Clinton street; also between Clinton street and the alley parallel to and between Clinton street and Mason street; also from said alley to Mason street and also between Mason street and Antirum street; also a paved driveway on each side of said parking from the south line of Park avenue south to the south line of Antirum street eighteen (18) feet in width including the necessary curbing, gutters, man holes, cross walks, sewerages and approaches and water main for sprinkling; also in center of said street and electric light wire conduits for lighting said street, is necessary public improvement.

Resolved further, that the plans, diagrams, specifications and estimate of cost be deposited with the City Clerk for public examination, and that notice thereof, and of the proposed improvement, and of the district to be assessed, as above described and designated, and that the common council of the City of Charlevoix will meet in the Council Room in said city on Monday the 13th day of March, 1916, at seven-thirty o'clock in the afternoon to consider any objections thereto, be given to publication for two weeks in the Charlevoix Courier, a newspaper, published and circulated in said city of Charlevoix.

Adopted, the 21st day of February, A. D. 1916.
O. E. Wilbur, Mayor
P. E. Vandermade, City Clerk.

Adopted at a regular session of the Common Council for the City of Charlevoix this 21st day of February, A. D. 1916 by the following aye and nay vote: Ayes, Geiken, Carey, Cartier, See and Priest. Nays none.
Ald. Priest was excused by the Mayor.

Why Prince Albert Wins

Patented Process is Responsible for Its International Popularity.

Smokers so much appreciate the flavor and coolness and aroma of Prince Albert pipe and cigarette tobacco that they often marvel that this one brand could be so different from all others.

The answer to this question is to be found on the reverse side of every Prince Albert package, where you will read: "Process Patented July 30th, 1907." That tells the whole story. Prince Albert is made by a patented process that cuts out the bite and parch, which makes the tobacco so mighty agreeable and satisfying to men of every taste of every civilized nation on the globe.

Smokers should realize that this patented process cost three years' continuous work and study and a fortune in money to perfect. But the result has proven to be worth all that was expended upon it, because it has set free men who believed they never could enjoy a pipe or a makin's cigarette.

Prince Albert makes it possible for every man to smoke a pipe or to roll his own cigarettes. And, no matter how tender the tongue, Prince Albert cannot bite or parch. That is cut out by the patented process, leaving for the smoker only the joys of the fragrant tobacco.

It is a fact that since Prince Albert "arrived," just about six years ago, it has made three men smoke pipes where one smoked a pipe before! Adv. 811

Hold Fast to What You Have

If there is anything more pathetic than the man who never had a home, or friend, or money, it is the man who had a home and did not appreciate it; friends and couldn't keep them; money and lost it.

The world is full of derelicts, and every town has its "has beens" who once "were." It is a sad commentary on human life that men must work and sacrifice and save; practice thrift for years; accumulate a competence, and for one reason or another lose it all, and begin over again worse by far, except for the experience.

Men who were once citizens of affluence will be found in the bread line, sleeping in the parks at night, living on relatives, in the poor house, selling shoestrings on Broadway, when by better management they might have been in comfortable circumstances.

PUT YOUR MONEY IN A GOOD BANK AND LEAVE IT THERE

Experience has proven that the average man can do no better than bank his money, for in making private investments risk attends and loss often follows. There are thousands of good banks, and bank books are mighty good investments.

DEMOCRATS in congress demoralized.
Disheartened, the Democratic members are guilty of deliberate neglect.
By actual daily count since the holidays the Democrats have been fewer in number on the floor of the house than Republicans, except for seven roll calls.
An uninformed observer would have supposed that the Republicans and not the Democrats were the responsible party.

There are in the house 228 Democrats and 197 Republicans. The record of attendance shows that on every day during January, with the exceptions noted, the Republicans outnumbered the Democrats on the floor, some times two to one and some times three to one.

Here is the record by daily actual count:

Democruta		Democrata
January	present	January	present
5	21	19	42
6	20	20	27
7	19	21	20
8	31	22	18
10	25	24	50
11	25	25	48
12	11	26	62
13	13	27	29
14	8	28	21
15	23	29	29
17	17	31	11
18	12

The inability of the Democratic party to legislate has been shown in the past.
Haste, inaccuracy and crude incompet-ency run like a scarlet thread through the statutes they have enacted.

To this record is now being added the proof of shameful neglect. With a majority in congress responsible for the enactment or failure of an important program, the Democrats have constantly shirked that responsibility.

Listless, hopelessly divided among themselves, they are furnishing a conspicuous example, not only of their incapacity to handle the affairs entrusted to them, but also a total lack of appreciation of the necessity for close application to the business in hand if errors and disastrous consequences are to be avoided.

Notice to Lot Owners

LEAVES FIRM TO OLD EMPLOYEES

Publisher Rewards Those Who Helped Build Up Business.

EIGHTY-FIVE ARE BENEFITED

His Secretary, Longest in His Employ, Gets $30,000, Another Gets $20,000, and Those Who Have Not Been There So Long Smaller Amounts, Composing Room Happy.

The late John A. Hill, head of the Hill Publishing company, New York, believed with Benjamin Altman that good service extending over many years should be rewarded. Because of his belief two of his oldest employees came to their office the other day to find themselves possessed of a comfortable fortune, and about eighty-five others were notified by a notice tacked on the bulletin board in their locker rooms that they had inherited $1,000 or more from their employer's will.

Mr. Hill's will was admitted to probate in Newark, N. J. Under its terms William W. Mayer, treasurer of the company, receives $25,000 for his twenty-two years' connection with the firm, and Miss Rose Steiner, who was Mr.
Hill's private secretary, receives $30,- 000 for a longer period of service.

The will also allows $2,500 to every employee who has worked in any capacity whatsoever for twenty-five years in Mr. Hill's employ, $2,000 for those who have served twenty years, $1,500 for those who have served fifteen years and $1,000 for those who have served ten years.

All Legacies a Surprise.

"The whole thing was unexpected," said Mr. Mayer. "I can't say how many employees will benefit by it, for, not knowing that this was to happen, I have not looked up the records. Mr.
Hill made his will several years ago, and he expected to live longer than he did. That is why the provisions were made for the twenty-five and twenty year periods. There are no employees with such a record, as the company is not old enough, but there are about eighty-five who have served from ten to eighteen years."

They are of all sorts and all jobs, these beneficiaries. In point of service and in the amount of her inheritance Miss Steiner comes first. A little, dark, alert woman, she has been Mr. Hill's secretary since he came to New York as editor of the American Machinist more than twenty-five years ago and cast her fortunes with his when he and Augustus Stieglitz bought the Locomotive Engineer in 1891. She and Mr. Mayer are the only ones remaining of those who became his employees at the time.

Composing Room to Benefit.

The others are for the most part in positions of minor importance, although there are a few of the executives who come under the terms of the will. The great bulk and five of the eighty-five are subscription clerks, advertising writers and the like. There is one department that is largely represented, and that is the composing room.
It is little more than ten years ago that the big printers' strike hit New York, and Mr. Hill was one of the sufferers.
He hired strike breakers to keep going, and practically all of these men stayed permanently, as the business is run as an open shop. John Hill's strike breakers of ten years ago have received an average of $1,000 a year as a bonus for their service through the bequest of the will.

The remainder of the estate is to be held in trust for his wife, Emma B.
Hill, and his daughter, Miss Jean Carlisle Hill. The business continues as before. It consists of five trade journals—the Locomotive Engineer, the American Machinist, the Engineering and Mining Journal, the Engineering News and the Coal Age. Mr. Hill died suddenly of apoplexy on Jan. 24.

CHAPTER XXIV.

The Count Wants the Castle.

SAW them board the train. In his heart there was the memory of a dozen kisses had bestowed in repentant horror upon the half asleep Rosemary, who, God bless her little soul, cried bitterly on being torn away from my embrace.

"Well," said Billy Smith, taking me by the arm a few minutes later, "let's have a bite to eat and a cold bottle before we go to bed, old chap. I hope to heaven she gets through all right. I am strong for her, aren't you?"

"I am," said I, with conviction, coming out of a daze.

He led me off to a cafe, where he seemed to be more or less at home, and where it was bright and gay for him, but gloomier than the grave to me.

I drove the car home the next day. When he got down at the garage, Britton shivered and drew a prodigious breath. It was as if he had not breathed for hours. We had gone the distance in little more than half the time taken on the trip down.

"My word, air," was all he said, but there was a significant tremor in his voice. It smacked of pride.

Mrs. Titus placidly inquired how we had got along and appeared quite relieved when I told her we had caught the train at K. Jasper Junior revealed a genuine interest in the enterprise, but apologetically said that Allie, now prematurely safe, was most likely to leap out of the frying pan into the fire by marrying some blithering fool, and having the whole heavenly business to do over again.

"How soon do they get?" asked Poopendyke late that afternoon, after listening to Mrs. Titus' amiable prophecies concerning Allie's future activities and getting my harassed ear in a moment of least resistance.

"I don't know," said I hopelessly. I had heard about all I could endure concerning his lordship's magnificent estates in England, and the sort of a lord he was besides. "There's nothing to do but wait, Fred."

"She is a remarkably fine woman, but"—He completed the estimate by asking his head, trusting to my intelligence, I suppose.

We waited two days for word from the fugitives. Late in the afternoon of the second day Britton returned from town with a telegram for me. It said:

Cargo safely aboard. Penderis, Captain Pardee commanding. Clear at 1 today. Everything satisfactory. C. G. RAPT.

No sooner was this reassuring news received than Mrs. Titus complacently set about having her trunks packed. The entire household was in a stew of activity, for she had suddenly decided to catch the 8 o'clock train for Paris. I telephoned to reserve accommodation on the Orient express from Vienna and also to have it stopped at the town across the river, a concession secured at no inconsiderable cost.

She was to travel once more as my mother.

"You will not fail to look us up when you come to New York, will you, Mr. Smart?" Mr. Titus will not be happy until he has expressed to you in person his endless gratitude. You have been splendid. We shall never forget your kindness, your thoughtfulness, your—your forbearance. I—I—"

Upon my word, there were real tears in the dear lady's eyes. I forgot and forgave much in recognition of this faint but genuine feeling on her part. It was not necessary for her to complete the sentence so humbly begun.

The departure was made with some degree of confusion. Mrs. Titus rather considerably reminding herself that my interests were at stake. I saw them aboard the train. She played her part admirably—I will say that for her. She lifted her veil so that I could bestow a farewell kiss upon her cheek. Jasper Junior's eyes popped very wide open at this, and as he shook my hand warmly in parting he said:

"You are a wonder, John—a sure enough wonder. Why, hang it all, she doesn't even let dad do that."

But Jasper Junior was very young, and he couldn't understand.

At last we were to ourselves, my extensive household and I. Late that night I sat in my study considering the best means of reducing my staff of servants and in contemplating, with dismay, the cost of being a private host to people who had not the least notion when it meant to do sums in economic subtraction. It was soon apparent to me that retrenchment, stern and relentless, would have to follow upon my said thought being a private host to people who had not the least notion when it meant to do sums in economic subtraction.

I was decidedly lonely. Poopendyke was worried about my father, no longer. At the end of a week he took it upon himself to drop in to the Hazards, offering them to run out for a visit in the hope that company might take the out of myself. All attempts to renew my work on the ill-fated novel met with utter failure. The power of mental concentration was gone. I spent most of my time in the garden.

This Hazards came and with them the joyously beautiful Betty Blity. Poopendyke must have prepared them for this task in hand, for they proceeded at once to transform the bleak, dreary old castle into a sort of hilarious merry-go-round, with me in the very vortex of it all. They succeeded in taking me "out of myself." I will say that for them. My spirits took an upward bound and, wonderful to relate, retained their altitude in spite of all I could do to lower them. I did not want to be happy. I figured that, I owed it to my recently aroused temperament to be permanently unhappy. But the wind blew another way, and I drifted merrily with it, as a derelict drifts with the currents of the ocean, but preferably with the warm gulf stream.

We had word from Mrs. Titus in London that negotiations had been reopened with the count and that a compromise might be expected. The obstinate nobleman had agreed, it seemed, to meet Jasper Titus' lawyers in Paris at no distant date. My chief concern, however, was for the countess herself. That she had successfully received the high seas was apparent; if not the newspapers, which I read with eagerness, would have been filled with accounts of her seizure. We eagerly awaited the promised telegram from New York announcing her safe arrival there.

Smith joined us at the end of the week. I served myself to question him about the Englishman.

"Splendid fellow," said he, with discouraging fervor; "one of the finest chaps I know, eh, George?"

"For an Englishman," admitted Hazard.

"He's a gentleman, and that's more than you can say for the fastag of nobility that paid court to Allie Tarnoway. He was in love with her, but he was a gentleman about it. A thoroughbred, I say."

"Good looking?" I inquired.

"Well, rather—the sort of chap women rave about. Ask Hetty. She was mad about him, but he couldn't see anything in her. I think she hated him now. He had eyes for no one but the four countess. An awful grind on Betty. She's used to something different."

Hazard studied the clouds that drifted over our heads. "I wonder if Allie cured anything for him."

"He always believed that she liked him better than she cared to admit even to herself."

"I fancy he'll not let any grass grow under his feet now that she's free," said Dr. Hazard.

"Think she'll have him?"

"Why not? He has a much better position in England than Tarnoway has here, and he's not after her money. I hate to say it, but Allie is a seeker after titles. She wouldn't be averse to adding 'your ladyship' to her collection."

"Oh, come!" I protested. "That is a nasty thing to say, George."

"She may have been regenerated," he said obligingly. "You know her better than I do, old chap. What say?"

"I didn't say anything," I muttered. "I thought you did."

I hesitated a moment and then purged myself of the truth. "As a matter of fact, I have reason to believe she's in love with Amberleigh and has been for a long time. I'm not saying it in disparagement, believe me. God knows she's entitled to something decent and fine in the shape of love. I hope he's good enough for her."

They looked at me with interest, and Smith broke the momentary silence.

"Oh, he's good enough for her," he said, with a queer smile.

"I'm glad of that," I said gruffly. "The old lady—mean Mrs. Titus—will be tickled to death if the match is pulled off," said Hazard.

"She was tickled the first time," said I sentimentally, and changed the subject. There was no sense in prolonging the agony.

Toward the close of their visit a message arrived from the countess herself, signed with the fictitious name we had agreed upon. The news she gave caused us to celebrate that night. We had a bottle in the courtyard and drank to the god of good luck.

Cargo safely landed in New York and forwarded to the Adlon-Wald for storage and to await the appearance of a claimant. Former owner has agreed to accept $150,000 and release all claims. When are you coming over? ALROSE.

By the most extraordinary coincidence a court, businesslike letter arrived in the evening post from Mrs. Tarnoway postmarked Paris. Its contents suggested me.

John Belmont Smart, Esq.:
Dear Mr. Smart:—Will you put a price on Schloss Rothbofen? I am desirous of purchasing the castle if you care to sell and we can agree upon a fair price for the property. Sentiment moves me in this matter, and I earnestly hope that you may be induced to part with your white elephant. It you will do so kind as to wire your decision, you will find me deeply grateful and at the risk for the ensuing fortnight. Faithfully yours, MARIS TARNOWSKY.

My "white elephant!" I was so eager to get rid of it that I would have sold it at once, naming a figure proportionately low had it not been for the united protests of my four friends and the canny advice of Mr. Poopendyke.

"Soak him!" said he, and I arose to the occasion.

I waited for three days and then telegraphed him that I would not sell for less than $250,000, more than doubling the price I had paid for the property. I was prepared, however, to come down a little hundred thousand or so if he revealed signs of reluctance.

We both another bottle that night and dined around it like so many savages.

Terms acceptably. Will come to Schloss Rothbofen at once to complete the transaction.
TARNOWSKY.

Accompanied by Hazard and Smith, I went over the castle from town to bottom in quest of the reason for Tarnowsky's prompt acceptance of my demand. We had no doubt that he had a good and sufficient reason for wanting the place, and but one thing suggested itself to our imagination; his absolute certainty that treasure was hidden somewhere about the venerable pile, treasure of considerable magnitude, you may be sure, or he would not have revealed such alacrity in accepting my terms. Sentiment had nothing to do with this surprising move on his part. That was all bosh. He had an ulterior motive, and it was for me to get the better of him at his own game if I could. While I was eager to get rid of the castle at any price, I did not relish the thought of being laughed at for a fool by Mrs. Tarnoway after he had laid his greedy hands upon treasure that had been mine without my knowledge.

He was no fool. The castle meant nothing to him as a home or as an investment. No doubt he would hound it to pieces in order to unearth the thing he knew its walls secreted.

We spent two unprofitable days in going over the place, and in the end sunk down tired, dejected and without the slightest evidence in our possession that so much as a half crown lay hidden there as treasure trove. I gave in and announced that if Tarnowsky could find anything worth having he was entitled to it so far as I was concerned, and I wouldn't begrudge him a farthing's worth.

He telegraphed that he would arrive on the morning of the third day, accompanied by his lawyer, a notary and an architect. My four guests departed in haste by the late night train after extracting a promise from me to join them in Vienna when I was no longer the master of Schloss Rothbofen. I rather relished the thought of a brief vacation.

Then, like the spider, I crept back into my web and waited for the foolish fly, knowing all the time that he would have the better of me in the long run.

I confess to a feeling of sadness in parting with the place, after all, elephantine though it was in every sense of the word. Within its gray and ancient walls that beautiful thing called love had come to me to live with me forever. It had come unbidden, against my will, against my better judgment and in spite of my prejudices, but still it was a thing to cherish and to hold in its virgin youth all through the long years to come. It would always be young and sweet and rose colored, this unrequited love of mine. Walking through the empty, dismantled rooms that had once been hers, I grew sick with longing and in something like fear fled downward, absurd tears blinding my eyes. Verily, I was a fool—a monstrous, silly fool!

Tarnowsky was as bland and smiling as a May morning as he came jauntily down the great hall to where I awaited him.

"I am bere incognito, my dear Smart," he said, extending his gloved hand, while I took perforce. "Sub rosa, you might say," he went on, with a wry smile. "A stupid, unchivalric airfare has despatched upon me, perfunctorily perhaps, but it's just as well not to stir up the monkeys, as you Americans would put it."

"Our late friend, the baron, was not totally without friends, I take it," said I dryly.

He made a grimace. "Nor enemies," he declared. "I have men usually have more enemies than friends, and he was a brave man, a truly brave man. Because he was a brave man I have no feeling of regret over the outcome of our meeting. It is no honor to kill a coward, Mr. Smart."

He introduced his three companions. I was surprised to see that the lawyer was not the fawning Schymansky and later on inquired for him. Tarnowsky laughed. "Poor old Schymansky! He is in prison."

"Ah! I am not surprised," said I. "He was my second, poor chap. It did not occur to him to run away after the—er—deal. They had to make an example of some one. His trial comes up next week. I am afraid he may be dealt with rather harshly. I miss him dreadfully. That let's come to the matter in hand, Mr. Smart. I dare say your time is valuable. You have placed with Mr. Saks, I am sure. He the architect who is to rebuild the castle for me. My attorney and Mr. Poopendyke, the notary, will, with your assistance, draw up the proper contracts preliminary to the formal transfer, and I will sign them with you upon my return."

"Would it not be better to discuss the question of payments before we go any further, Count Tarnowsky?"

"You will be paid in cash. Mr. Smart, the instant the deed is transferred," he said coolly.

I followed him to the top of the stairs which descended to the basement of the castle. It was rather a pleasant fact to be elected to explore the lower regions first of all.

"I shall accompany you," said I deliberately.

A faint smile came into his face. He eyed me fixedly for a moment, then shrugged his shoulders and said that his only desire was to avoid putting me to any unnecessary trouble. If I cared to come he would be more than grateful.

"It isn't necessary to visit the cellars, Saks," he said to the architect. "Ample time for that sort of rummaging. I particularly want your opinion on the condition of the intersecting walls on this floor and above. My scheme of improvement, Mr. Smart, contemplates the enlargement of these halls by throwing them into one."

"A very simple process," said I. "If the whole structure doesn't topple down upon your heads while you're about it, I shall contrive to save my scalp."

TEMPERANCE NOTES

(Conducted by the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union.)

COMPARE THESE FIGURES.

Why is prohibition sentiment making such rapid strides in Ohio? Here are some facts that may partly answer the question:

The 45 dry Ohio counties sent to the State Industrial school, during the year, 76 boys. The 43 wet counties, entitled by population to send 228, sent 260.

The 45 dry counties sent to the penitentiary 106. The 43 wet counties, entitled by population to send 318, sent 609.

The 45 dry counties sent to the reformatory 88. The 43 wet counties, entitled by population to send 249, sent 682.

The 45 dry counties sentenced to workhouses 118. The 43 wet counties, entitled by population to send 354, sent 967.

The 45 dry counties sentenced to jail imprisonment 497. The 43 wet counties, entitled by population to send 1,491, sent 2,646 (with Cleveland not reported to add to the wet side).

The 45 dry counties expended for maintenance of jail prisoners $21,316.06. The 43 wet counties, entitled by population to $63,948.18, spent $139,750 (with Lucas and Clark counties and the cities of Toledo and Springfield not reported to add to the wet side).

Cost of jail prisoners in 45 dry counties, one year, $21,316.06. Cost in one wet county alone (Hamilton), with only one-third as many people, $21,037.90.

LIQUOR MEN'S ARGUMENT.

Replying to the paid orators of the saloon who declare that if it was not intended that men should drink alcoholic liquor God would not have created the rye, the corn, etc., from which it is manufactured, the Amari-can issue says: "They might declare that if God had not intended men to drink booze, he would not have created the wood that builds the saloon, the brass in the fixtures, the quartz melted into the goblet or the iron which, molten, makes the stove. They might carry the argument farther and say that if God had not intended men to drink alcohol that he would not have created the mouth with which to imbibe. Until it can be shown that God created a man's tongue so that he could lie and hands that he might steal, there is not very much in the argument that the Creator made corn and rye that men might make alcohol therefrom for the purpose of poisoning themselves and their fellowman for profit."

ASKING TOO MUCH.

"I belonged to the Good Follows' club until a little while ago, and I left it—not for any moral reason, but for a cold-blooded reason. I thought Mr. Barleycorn was asking just a little too much for liquor. In addition to the price that he and I agreed upon, he asked for my country—my government, local, state and national. He demanded a mountain range of blasted homes; 50,000 boys and girls as driftwood in his River of Death; the eyesight of babies and the peace of old age."

"Barefoot soldiers gave us independence, but barefoot children do not have to give us revenue! In this fight you do not have to die. All you have to do is to make a modest investment in human progress and in the Kingdom of God."—Ex-Congressman Landis of Indiana.

RESPECT FOR MINISTER.

A snookkeeper offered a young minister $40 to help pay a church debt. The money was needed very badly, but the minister replied: "Before I accept that contribution I must let you know my attitude toward your business. As long as I am a minister in this town I shall fight your business as hard as I know how. I shall tell the young men and boys what you will do to them, and if I get a chance when election time comes I shall vote to put you out of business."

The snookkeeper thrust the money toward the minister and said: "Take it; I wouldn't have any respect for you if you didn't do those very things."

TEMPTING FUTURE SOLDIERS.

In Britain 4,000,000 men have applied for service. One million have been rejected. If peace standards were being applied 3,000,000 would have been rejected. Commenting upon this, Dr. C. W. Saleeby, the eugenist, says: "We tempted the future soldiers with drink at sixteen. This million of rejected men were once younger."

He also says: "No instructed German would deny the fact that his own country's figures are worse."

DEAD SURE TO LOSE.

"There are two things that are hurrying national prohibition," said a brewery agent to a W. C. T. U. woman—"first, the great new efficiency basis in the industrial world (men of capital and men of the laboring class have come to see that John Barleycorn does not pay in dollars and cents); and second, the enfranchisement of the woman in the United States. If the big corporations do not put us out of business before long, the woman's halo will lead sure."

SEASONING LUMBER.

Simple Method of Preventing the Ends From Cracking.

To prevent the ends of lumber from cracking while in the process of seasoning procure strips of soft wood not over seven-eighths inch thick and of same width and length as thickness and width of board to be seasoned. writes James F. Habert in Blacksmith and Wheelwright—that is, for two inch stock twelve inches wide the strips should be two inches wide, seven-eighths inch thick and twelve inches long. Two strips will be needed for each board to be seasoned. Get some fourpenny nails (single nails) and nail one of the soft wood strips on each end of each board or plank to be seasoned, using three nails in each strip, one at each end and one in the middle.

Once the strips are nailed on the ends of the lumber to be seasoned pile and season in the usual manner, taking care to protect from the sun if piled during the hot months, but if piled in fall, winter or spring the sun will do no harm. Lumber splits at the ends because the sap tubes, being open, cause the ends to dry out before the rest of the wood can get dry, and the shrinkage of the dried wood pulls itself apart because the portion which is green cannot compress itself under the strain of seasoning; hence the appearance of the cracks which damage the lumber so much. But with the soft wood strips securely fastened to the ends the drying out takes place evenly all through the plank, and there is no inducement for one portion to split away from any other portion, and the plank remains in perfect condition during the drying operation.

AUTOMOBILE JACK.

Simple Contrivance That Raises Four Wheels at Once.

A steel jack, adjustable for various makes of cars, which is designed to lift all four wheels from the floor simultaneously, says Popular Mechanics. The momentum of the car carries it on to the jack, which automatically raises the car clear of the floor one and a half inches, permitting wheels to be taken off, tires examined or removed, and keeps the pressure off the tires when the car is not in use. It is also valuable from the fact that tires are thus kept out of the oil and grease often found on garage floors. While this raised the engine may be tested without danger of the car being jacked to the floor. The jack is as arranged that any length of wheel base may be taken care of by simple adjustments.

Effects of Radium on Gamma.

Many precious stones show a remarkable change of color in the presence of radium. In late German experiments a colorless diamond from Borovoe became pale yellow after an exposure of eight days to impure radium bromide, deeper yellow in eight days more, and was not wholly restored to its original colorlessness by heating to redness. The light blue of a sapphire turned to green in two hours, then to yellow, reddish yellow and, after fourteen days, to yellowish brown. The color disappeared on heating, a light yellow invariably reappearing, however, when the stone became cold. The rays did not affect the color of the amethyst, but blue topaz or chrysosbery, but a tourmaline with a green tint became green at any other point on which the rays acted.

The Critophone.

An English voice specialist has invented a machine which enables a singer to hear his own voice just as it sounds to his audience. The demand for such a contrivance has been so great that countless adaptations of the phonograph and of the telephone have been tried out in the endeavor to obtain a correct reproduction of the voice of a speaker or singer, so that he can criticize his own delivery and modify his tone to obtain the best results. All these devices lacked in some essential feature, but the new machine, called the "critophone," is claimed by the inventor to overcome all objections urged against other models.

Detroit's City Garbage Plant.

A municipal garbage reduction plant will be built at Detroit, having a maximum capacity of 300 tons per day. The city garbage amounts to some 50,000 tons per annum. George H. Penkell, commissioner of public works, has secured an appropriation of $475,000 for the project. A site has been purchased, and it is proposed to embody in the works in every way the best practice of the day. The plant is to be in operation by July, 1916. Engineers have been appointed to prepare plans and specifications for buildings and equipment. Engineering News.

A FOOL AND HIS MONEY

By George Barr McCutcheon

Mr. Smart, no matter what happens. It is very precious to me."

CHAPTER XXV.

I Burn a Few Bridges.

Went over the estate rather hurriedly, I thought, but he explained that Saks merely wanted a general idea of the structure; he would return another day to make a careful inspection.

"I dare say you are surprised that I should be willing to pay double your original price for Schloss Rothhoefen," he ventured, pausing in the corridor to light a cigarette. We were on our way to the top of the east wing.

"Oh, no," I said calmly. "I am aware that treasure is buried here. As a matter of fact, I've tried to unearth it myself, but without success. I wish you better luck."

"Thanks," said he laconically, after the first swift glance of inquiry. "It is doubtless a fairy tale, handed down by tradition. I take no stock in it. My principal object in acquiring Rothhoefen is to satisfy a certain vanity which besets me. I have it on excellent authority that my ex-father-in-law—the man Titus, you know—talks of buying the property and performing the stupendous, characteristic American feat of removing it, stone and timber, just as it is, to his estate north of New York city. No one but a vulgar, purse-proud American would think of doing such a thing."

The news staggered me. Could there be anything in what he said? If it was true that Jasper Titus contemplated such a quixotic move there could be but one compelling force behind the whim—sentiment. But not sentiment on the part of Jasper Titus.

"I cannot believe that he considers doing such a thing," I said, rather blankly. "You see, if any one should know, I am that one. He has not approached me, of that you may be sure."

He did not appear to be interested. "My information is not authoritative," Mr. Smart said. "It came to me through my representatives who conferred with his lawyers a fortnight ago in regard to certain difficulties that had existed between us. From what they were able to gather, the idea has taken root in the old man's head. Now, I want to buy this place for no other reason than to tell him that he hasn't enough money in his possession to purchase it from me. D'you see? Vanity, you may call it, as I do, but it pleases me to coddle it."

Very thoughtfully I strode along beside him. Would I be serving the countless ill or well by selling the place to Tarnowsky? It was her whim, of course, and it was a foolish one. "Suppose that he offered you twice what you are to pay me for the place," said I, struck by a sudden thought.

He laughed easily. "You will not, it seems, acquit me of cupidity, Mr. Smart. I should not sell to him under any consideration. That is final. Take it or leave it."

By this time we were in the rooms once occupied by the countess. He glanced about the apartment carelessly. "Deserted, I observe," he remarked with a queer smile.

My heart almost stood still. "Eh? What do you mean?"

"If I am not mistaken, these are the rooms once occupied by your valet's wife. Am I right?"

I shuddered myself. "She has gone away," I said. "Couldn't stand the climate."

"I see," said he, but he was still smiling. "How does your valet stand it?"

"Nervely," said I, with a conscious blush.

"I mean the separation, of course." "Certainly." He is used to it.

"Isn't it rather odd that he should still think she is here in the castle?" "Does he?" I murmured.

"I inquired for her when I encountered him downstairs. He said she was quite well this morning, except for a headache. "She is subject to headaches, I believe," said I, with the utmost nonchalance. He lifted his right eyebrow slightly, but said no more on the subject.

A pile of rubbish lay heaped in one corner of the room, swept up and left there by the big Schmucks to await the spring housecleaning season, I presume. Tarnowsky at first eyed the heap curiously, then rather tentatively. Suddenly he strode across the room and gingerly rooted among the odds and ends with the toe of his highly polished boot.

To my horror a dilapidated doll detached itself and rolled out upon the floor, a well remembered treasure of Rosemary's and so unique in appearance that I doubt if there was another in the world like it. Indeed, I have a distinct recollection of being told that the child's father had painted in the extraordinary features and had himself decorated the original dazeen locks with singular stripes of red and white and blue, a sardonic tribute to the home land of her mother.

I turned away as he stooped and picked up the soiled, discarded effigy. When next I looked at him out of the corner of my eye he was holding the doll at arm's length and staring at it with a fixed gaze. I knew that he recognized it. There could be no doubt in his mind as to the identity of that telltale object. My heart was thumping fiercely.

An instant later he rejoined me, but not a word did he utter concerning the strange discovery he had made. His face was set and pallid, and his eyes were misty. Involuntarily I looked to see if he had the doll in his hand and in that glance observed the haunting surmise of his countenance.

In silence we stood there awaiting the reappearance of Saks, who had gone into one of the adjoining rooms. I confess that my hand trembled as I lighted a fresh cigarette. He was staring moodily at the floor, his hands clasped behind his back. Something smacking of real intelligence ordered me to hold my tongue. I smoked placidly, yet waited for the outburst. It did not come. It never came. He kept his thoughts, his emotions, to himself, and for that single display of restraint on his part I shall always remember him as a true descendant of the nobility.

We tramped down the long flights of stairs side by side, followed by the supercilious Mr. Saks, who did all of the talking. He was, I think, discoursing on the extraordinary ability of ancient builders, but I am not absolutely certain. I am confident Tarnowsky did not hear a word the fellow said.

In my study we found Poopendyke and the two strangers.

"Have you made out the pupers?" demanded the count harshly. An ugly gleam had come to his eyes, but he did not direct it toward me. Indeed, he seemed to avoid looking at me at all.

"Yes, Count Tarnowsky," said the lawyer. "They are ready for the signatures."

"Perhaps Mr. Smart may have reconsidered his offer to sell," said Tarnowsky. "Let him see the contracts."

"I have not reconsidered," I said quietly.

"You may sign here, Mr. Smart," said the notary as he gave me the document, a simple contract, I found.

"Jasper Titus will offer more than I can afford to pay," said the count. "Please do not feel that I am taking an unfair advantage of you. I am absolutely certain that he wants to buy this place for—his granddaughter, a descendant of barons."

The significance of this remark was obvious, and it was the nearest he ever came to uttering the conviction that had been formed in that illuminating five minutes upstairs. If he suspected—and I think he did—he preferred not to ask the questions that must have been searing his corneal brain. It was a truly wonderful demonstration of self-restraint. I would have given much to be able to read his innermost thoughts, to watch the perplexed movements of his mind.

"Schloss Rothhoefen is yours, Count Tarnowsky," said I. "It is for you to say whether his whim shall be gratified."

His lips twitched. I saw his hand touch the bulging coat pocket with a swift, passing movement.

"Will you be good enough to sign, Mr. Smart?" he said coldly. He glanced at his watch. "My time is valuable. When can you give possession?"

"The day the deed is transferred." "That will be no less than three days. I have satisfied myself that the title is clear. There need be no delay."

We signed the contract after I had requested Poopendyke to read it aloud to me. It called for the payment of 50,000 kronen, or a little over $2,000.

To take up the question of your reading matter with us. If the above list does not appeal to you come in and we will quote you money-saving prices on any magazine or paper published. These are the greatest newspaper bargains ever offered by any newspaper in Northern Michigan. It has always been our aim to save Courier readers all we could on their reading matter. This fall we are doing even better than before. We also give cut rates on all magazines, daily papers and trade magazines. The saving usually runs about 15 per cent, but in some instances it will amount to more. Keep in mind at all times that we can and will save you money on your newspaper and magazine subscriptions. These rates are absolutely cash propositions as they must be paid in advance.

WIRELESS TO LINK TWO AMERICAS

Radio Scheme Is Approved by Secretary Daniels.

FIRST STEPS ARE INFORMAL

Central and South American Sentiment Favors Plan For One General Means of Communication, and the State Department Forwards Suggestions to Other Capitals.

A definite plan for establishment of a government owned, co-operative radio service embracing all the republics of the western hemisphere and assuring satisfactory communication among them at all times has been formally approved by Secretary Daniels of the navy department and will be transmitted by the state department for the approval of the various governments concerned. It will carry the full endorsement of the United States government, together with an expressed desire that it be given careful and earnest consideration.

Features of the Proposal.

The chief features of the proposal are:

That each republic own and control all radio stations within its territory. That where such ownership and control are impracticable arrangements be made by the governments to take over and operate such stations in time of emergency.

That concessions be granted by each government for the interchange of communication, particularly for the transmission of official business and that tending to promote commercial relations and international exchanges of various kinds.

Details of the plan were worked out by Captain W. H. G. Bullard, superintendent of the naval radio service, and they follow closely the recommendations outlined recently by Secretary Daniels to the delegates attending the pan-American scientific congress.

The proposals to go forward to the other republics discuss at length the system under which the United States naval wireless service is operated, suggesting that the proposed all American service be based upon a like system.

Necessary arrangements for establishment of the service would involve systematizing of all radio machinery and adoption by the various countries of the same or similar methods of operation.

First Steps Are Informal.

In transmitting the proposal to the governments of South and Central America the state department will act wholly in an informal capacity.

Negotiations of a formal character may follow, and it is proposed that as a step in that direction a conference be held, at which delegates representing the various countries would be brought together for general discussion of the project.

There was a virtually unanimous sentiment in favor of the proposition when it first was suggested by Secretary Daniels, and all officials expect that it will be approved by a majority of the South and Central American governments.

Both navy and army officials in Washington attach great importance to the plan, declaring it would add materially to the value of communication facilities at the disposal of this government in time of war and would knit the nations of the three Americas closer together against any common foe which might threaten their integrity as guaranteed by the Monroe doctrine.

Other officials have advocated the proposal in the belief that it would also contribute largely to the promotion of trade between the American republics.

THANKED BY BLIND MEMBER.

House Listens to Touching Address by Thomas D. Schall.

A touching scene was staged in the house the other day when Representative Thomas D. Schall, a blind member from Minnesota, thanked his colleagues for passing in his absence a resolution giving him the personal service of a page at all times.

"To the blind man," he said, "work is a pleasure, and by giving me the means of doing more work you have expended my pleasure and released me from bondage and given me freedom. The hands which reach out to me and the voices which encourage me make bright the otherwise gray days and give me a renewed zest to fight the game of life."

"They say that whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth. I have often wished that he had not loved me quite so much, but you know Robert Louis Stevenson says that so long as a man has a friend he is not useless, and I find that I have many friends and through their kindness I am not useless."

"I thank you for your consideration and perhaps may be permitted to say to you with full pride that—
"In the full clutch of circumstance I have not whined nor cried aloud; Under the bludgeonings of chance My head is bloody, but unbowed, And all the menace of the years Finds and shall find me unafraid. It matters not how straight the gate, How charged with punishments the scroll—I am the master of my fate; I am the captain of my soul."

GREAT SALT LAKE.

No Water Is Saline Simply Because It Has No Outlet.

Great Salt Lake has no outlet. The Jordan river, which enters it from the south, is the outlet of Utah lake. Bear river, coming from the north, carries the outflow from Bear lake. The waters of Utah and Bear lakes and of Jordan and Bear rivers are fresh, and so is the water of Weber river, the third great tributary of Great Salt lake, but the lake into which the three rivers flow is saline. It is saline because it has no outlet.

The fresh waters of the rivers contain some saline matter, but the quantity is too small to be discovered by taste.

As stated by the chemist, in parts per million, the quantity seems minute, but when account is taken of the total volume of water brought by the streams to the lake in a year their burden of saline matter is found to be really great, amounting annually to more than 500,000 tons.

Year by year and century by century the water which they pour into the lake is evaporated, but the dissolved solids cannot escape in that way and therefore remain.

They have accumulated until the lake water is approximately saturated, holding nearly as much mineral matter as it can retain in solution. The lake contains over 5,000,000,000 tons of common salt and 900,000,000 tons of glauber salt (sodium sulphate) as well as other mineral matter.—New York Telegram.

Burial Customs of the Hittites.

Although the tombs of the necropolis had been rifled at an early date, a great deal that is new was learned about the burial customs of the Hittites. Graceful vases, simple in design and undecorated, held the ashes of the cremated body, together with any trinkets the person was wearing at the time of death. A small vase about a foot high was inclosed in a footed vessel of cylindrical shape, which was beautifully decorated in patterns like those of Crete and Cyprus. Around the middle vessel were grouped various dishes containing burial gifts or oil, most of them plain, but some of beautiful shape and as thin as modern china, though unglazed. It can well be seen that these vessels would protect the ashes from dampness from below, but as both were open at the top there was a large cover, like an enormous bowl, inverted over the other two vessels.—Christian Herald.

Coffin Pasties.

Since pies now are generally round, but there was a time when they were of a long, coffin shape and were, in fact, often referred to as "coffin pasties." But this somewhat gruesome name and shape do not appear to have detracted from their popularity. Scotch, for instance, in the edition of his "Jests" published in 1820, is reported to have said on his deathbed, "Meaters, I tell you all that stand about mee, if I might live to ente n Chrismasse pye I cana not if I dya by nnd by after; for Chrismasse pyen be good meat."—London Chronicle.

FUNERAL HELD SUNDAY

Friends and Neighbors Pay Last Respects to Late Fred Dennis.

Death claimed a popular young Ellsworth farmer in the person of Fred Dennis, last Friday morning, at the home of his mother, Mrs. Nellie Dennis, one and one-half mile west of this village.

Mr. Dennis had been ill some four weeks with appendicitis, and was operated upon Monday, February 14, but the dreaded disease had gained such a hold upon him that he failed to recover from the effects of the trouble.

Deceased was 18 years of age at the time of his death, and was married on September 3, 1915. Besides his sorrowing wife he leaves a mother, four sisters, Mary, Grace, Irene and Goldie, and three brothers, Eddie, Ray and Charles, to mourn their loss.

Mr. Dennis had taken the active management of his mother's farm, and was a hard-working, conscientious young man, holding the respect of those who knew him. The bereaved wife and family have the sympathy of the entire community.

Funeral services were held from the house Sunday at 10:00 o'clock a. m., conducted by Rev. Bond of Central Lake. Interment in Ellsworth cemetery.

Gold in Ancient Rome.

William Jacob in his "History of the Precious Metals" estimates from the accounts given by the Roman writers that in the reign of Augustus, the first of the emperors, when Rome was at the height of its power, the amount of gold in the Roman empire was nearly $2,000,000,000. This vast treasure had been gathered chiefly by conquest from various nations of Europe, Asia and Africa. There had been extensive mines in Spain and in the Atlas mountains of North Africa, but their yield in the wealth of kings and of cities in Asia and Egypt had been despoiled and carried away to enrich the conquerors.

HOME TEAM WINS AGAIN

Defeats Fast Co. I Team on Home Floor Saturday Night.

Splendid Individual Work Done by Members of Teams—Score 36 to 25.

Saturday night, February 19th, the Ellsworth basketball team met the fast Co. I, M. N. G., team of East Jordan on the home floor and came out victorious in a well-played game by the score of 36 to 25.

All the boys played good ball, but especial mention must be made of the work of Hamlin at center, who, besides playing a fine game, only lost one chance at foul baskets out of eight chances.

The attendance at the game was large and encouraging to the fellows who have given their time to the support of the team this year. The lineup:

East Jordan	Forward	Ellsworth
Miles		Chellis
Roy		Patterson
Smith	Center	Hamlin
Wible	Guard	Townsend
Risk		Brail

Sedgman and Dicken substituted for Risk and Roy in the second half for East Jordan. Score by halves: First half—Ellsworth 16, East Jordan 13; second half—Ellsworth 20, East Jordan 12.

A Sign of Rain.

As east side girls say she has come upon an infallible weather indicator. She can tell if it is going to rain without even glancing at the sky or casting her eyes over the weather forecasts in the daily papers. And it's the simplest thing in the world—just the disappearance of all umbrellas in sight.

"Umbrellas are perfectly safe in our office up to twenty-four hours before a storm," said she, explaining. "You can leave them anywhere. Even the pearl and gold handled ones are immune from abstraction. Indeed, one can hardly chase them away. So if I want to know the weather for a day ahead I must glance at the umbrella racks. If I find them becoming empty I make a bee line for the best rain shade of those that are left and make all other necessary plans for rain."

Reminiscences and Recollections of an Early Settler--By James A. Wilson

My story begins away back in '71, as a dwelling, being now used as a tenement house on the farm now owned by Mrs. Enos Emery.

My father's next move was to get a house built on his own 80, which Uncle Samuel had given him, joining my uncle's on the north, and which still remains in the family, my good mother owning one-half of it and yours truly the other half.

To build a house those days was no easy task. The nearest sawmill was at Torch Lake village, then known as Brown-town. Getting lumber in from there was next to impossible. But, thanks to my father's forethought, he brought with him a frow and with that and the aid of an Injun maul he converted some of the beautiful elm, basswood and cedar timber that grew in abundance contiguous to our buildings into lumber of no mean quality and of sufficient quantity for necessary sheathing, flooring, partitions, etc. He also split out and shaved all the shingles necessary for roofing, gables, etc.

To explain how we made a living for the first few years would take some time, but we lived and grew up. The lakes were alive with fish then, not little perch and sunfish, but the kind you dream about, large-mouth black bass, muskellunge and pickerel, until you couldn't rest. With those at hand and the woods full of wild game, and everything you planted grew splendidly without having to fight potato bugs or noxious weeds of any kind, it was not such a hard problem after all.

Of course, money was an unknown quantity, but what did we need money for? We had no taxes to pay. We did not have any doctor bills to pay. We did not dare to get sick, for there were no M. D.'s who could get to us and if they did they could not get any pay for it, as we did not have any money. So nobody got sick, nor did anybody ever die unless they were killed by the bears, and in that case they did not need any money either.

We lived here very socially until a new loghouse which was being built on the Colby place was finished, when we moved there, and, by the way, that same old loghouse is still doing service

Primary Notes

All of our pupils are back in school. We are glad to see them well again.

Our room had a valentine box Monday. Many pretty valentines were made and given to friends. The teacher gave candy kisses to the pupils.

Thelma Klooster was perfect in arithmetic all of last week.

The primary grades are dramatizing several plays to be given on Washington's Birthday.

Grammar Department.

Jennie VanDerHeide is unable to be in school. We hope she will fully recover soon.

The fifth grade learned the "The Children's Hour" by Longfellow last week.

Rev. Mr. Pickard gave us an interesting talk the 11th of February, on the life and character of Abraham Lincoln. Mr. Pickard said that at Mr. Lincoln reached the height of success by his greatness and stoicism. That these faculties combined with his superb honesty made him the man he was. He left the impression that though we can not become Lincoln, we can, like him, do the best that there is in us wherever our lot may be cast. As a whole the talk was interesting and instructive and left a good impression upon pupils and teacher.
